Public health officials use the theory of “herd immunity” as the rationale behind vaccine mandates. Originally, herd immunity theory was founded on communities which had attained natural immunity through the course of an infection, not those with vaccine-induced response. Children would experience illnesses from wild virus exposure, and non-vaccinated adults were naturally re-exposed to the wild virus as they cared for sick children, thus boosting the adult’s natural immunity. This type of immunity is generally lifelong and can be transmitted from mothers to infants through breastfeeding, thus protecting them until they are old enough to acquire the wild virus naturally and begin building their own lifelong immunity.

Vaccines DO NOT replicate this natural cycle because:

- Mothers who received vaccines have a lower concentration of virus-specific antibodies than mothers with naturally acquired immunity.
- Viruses mutate over time. Vaccines contain only outdated virus strains that offer scant protection from currently evolving natural disease strains.
- Vaccine immunity is temporary and frequently ineffective, with up to 74% of people not responding to repeated vaccinations. Populations with near 100% vaccination rates still experience outbreaks.
- Even after six doses of TDaP (Tetanus, Diphtheria, Pertussis), vaccine effectiveness declined to 34% after 2-4 years, likely contributing to increases in Pertussis among adolescents.

The Herd Immunity theory is a proven failure. Vaccinations contain toxins which have been shown to have mild to very serious reactions including seizures, paralysis and death.
