

What is it that we want to see in our young men? Is it a change in the style of clothing that has evolved so radically over the past few years? Is it their value system that unfortunately often praises the misogynistic ramblings of today's pop culture? Is it their redefining and interpretation of the 21st Century family? What is the final product that we desire to see in young men everywhere throughout the United States of America? We can no longer avoid addressing these issues in the hope that they will resolve themselves any time soon. Resolving these questions and implementing exciting, comprehensive strategies are essential if America is to realize its mission of creating healthy, young men who successfully transition into strong heads of households in the years to come.

Adult assistance and intervention is required in a profound and systematic way. Our young men must be made to feel valued and connected to something or someone. We must no longer fear them or marginalize their intellectual competencies in order to celebrate their more apparent athletic prowess. Far too many adults have discounted the academic potential of boys to the extent that it has permanently limited their quality of life options. We must be deliberate, strategic and consistent when interacting with America's 21st Century young men.

"How one defines and determines values is essential to determining who you are and what you will become. Many successful people develop these foundations in life at an early age."
