

Huckleberry Diesel

Editorial by Jamie Toth

Huckleberry Diesel – a sativa dominant hybrid —is a blend of OG Kush and NYC Diesel that offers a balanced, energized high with a gentle body buzz to relax the mood. Opening a bag of this strain from 54 Green Acres fills the room with the smells of wildflowers, beeswax, and sweet grass. Musky hints of strap leather, citrus oil, and freshly cut lumber remind me of some dusty western ranch in the foothills of the mountains, so I saddle up my equipment to ride this Huckleberry Diesel through a range of temperatures in the old desktop vaporizer. I also roll up a marijuana cigarette for good measure.

The terpene profile reflects what my nose has been telling me—myrcene, nerolidol, and caryophyllene are musky, woody, and peppery terpenes often associated with pain relief, and they make up about 2/3rds of the profile.

The first flavors to unlock in the low-temperature range of the vaporizer are floral: chamomile, orchids, and maybe some lavender far off in the distance. I immediately notice that the flavors are much more ‘huckleberry’ than ‘diesel’ at lower temperatures; the pungent smell of the dried buds giving way to a flowery softness in the vapor. As the temperature rises into the mid-range around 388°, the flowery hints give way to a peppery flavor. There is a cinnamon candy taste as the bouquet turns to hops, clove, and citrus, but those early hints of fresh nectar are still present. The thickening vapor gains a velvety texture but remains smooth.

Vaporizing Huckleberry Diesel at high temperature, NYC Diesel lineage becomes more apparent. What remains of those early wildflowers has become a heady perfume, and the cinnamon candy has given way to distinct overtones of peppercorns and beeswax. Despite the silkiness of the vapor, there is very little residue or aftertaste.

When smoking Huckleberry Diesel, the diesel namesake becomes more apparent. The smoke is milky and gentle on the throat but still twists slightly of sour cloves on the tongue. The penny candy cinnamon flavor from vaping at lower temperatures comes out as fresh-baked cinnamon muffins when smoking.

Huckleberry Diesel brings around a chatty, peaceful sensation; a great choice to include when sharing a hot cup of tea and a good conversation with a friend. I find that it gives the focused calm to really enjoy listening and exploring ideas without needing to get up and do much of anything but simply be in great company. It also offers a calming effect for quiet introspection while alone. The mind slows down just enough to become more contemplative without getting too sluggish.
