Current Monograph Project

Black Dada, Afro-Surrealism: Avant Gardes of the African Diaspora, traces routes of race within the global avant-garde movements Dada and Surrealism. For example, by putting African American Amiri Baraka's poem "Black Dada Nihilismus" in conversation with Romanian-born Tristan Tzara's early twentieth century translations of "Poèmes Nègres," I explore the role that race plays in Dada's rejection of bourgeois art. I also position understudied Afro-Caribbean Surrealist Suzanne Césaire at the center of a dialogue that heretofore took shape around her husband, Aimé Césaire, and Frenchman André Breton. Other writers in my study include Egyptian Surrealist Joyce Mansour and African American poet Erica Hunt. More broadly, I analyze how practitioners of Dada and Surrealism in the African Diaspora use art in the service of social change.

Current Book Project #2

Lake Forest College Press has solicited a volume from me on the work of African American poet Claudia Rankine for a new series on contemporary poets written by poet-scholars actively publishing in the field.

Current Creative Project

Mother(good) is multi-genre long poem (that also combines elements of memoir and research-based inquiry) that explores the treatment of mothers and families in the U.S.
