VACANT LAND MARKET

Demand for vacant land for the construction of new urban dwellings within Wallan has averaged 215 allotments over the past ten years to June 2013. More recently, average annual demand has risen to 280 lots per annum which has been a direct consequence of injections of new supply into the market place. Of particular note (as detailed in the graph below) is the period between the 2009 and 2011 financial years when the market saw a high volume of new land released to market which was rapidly absorbed. This is clear indicator of a strong underlying level of demand for new product in the market – reflecting a market in state of growth. More recently (over the past three years) demand has dropped below the long term average which has a direct correlation a distinct absence of new supply releases into the market. This may suggest, based on historic trends that the market is in a state of undersupply.
