Restoring Success: Embrace the New Year, Broccoli and All

Ditch the Cliches and Get to Work

By Lisa Lavender COO Restoration Technical Institute

The New Year is a time of goal setting and resolutions. Yes, I did the most predictable thing and downloaded the Fitness Pal app onto my phone. I have been eating raw broccoli with a big smile on my face. I am envisioning myself a size smaller every day that I wake up in 2016 and am extremely focused (5 days now). For some reason, the raw broccoli is not so bad. I have a mindset and a vision of being a size smaller and it is stronger than the craving of the cheeseburger and fries or the candy bar - eating broccoli is worth it.

We have a fresh start with the New Year. New goals, plans and strategies are in place and maybe we even wrote them down or have a checklist of items we plan to accomplish. Did we include the broccoli? It is a great time to buckle down and do or get done the items you may have been avoiding.

It is a human tendency to avoid what we do not like to do. Even the most disciplined owners and managers may avoid their least favorite tasks or turn their head to something that needs to be done or addressed because it is distasteful.

New Year. New Standards.

What are your companies goals for education this year?

by Stephan M. Schumm

Working in this industry is so exciting. Why? Because it is always changing. It is not a stagnant industry. From the time I first became a part of this, I am astonished as to the changes that continue to help us become better Restoration Technicians. With that being said, we cannot afford to become stagnant ourselves. It is important that we stay current with all the changes.

I love this quote by Larry Winget

"Training is expensive. Books are expensive. All learning is expensive. Being stupid is still much more expensive."
