5-5-5 Tolling of the Bell

Historically, long before radios and computer aided dispatch, in the late 19th Century, Americans in cities across the country either had to go to the nearest firehouse to report a fire, or, in the larger cities, go to a street corner and pull the handle on a fire alarm box. These boxes were found at intersections throughout a given city, and each one had its own special numeric identifier. Pulling that handle sent a signal to a fire alarm office that looked up the box location, and transmitted the alarm via telegraph to all firehouses due to respond.

Firefighters at each station learned which boxes to which they were first, second, or third due to respond and where they were located. When the telegraph activated a receiver at the firehouse, it triggered a series of bells to ring, alerting personnel to an emergency. If the series corresponded to boxes to which they were expected to respond, they immediately scrambled for their apparatus and departed for that location. In those days, if a box alarm was struck, the fire was usually easily located by arriving firefighters.

In New York City, this box alarm system was well developed. Tradition carries the story that the box to which firefighters responded and lost the first career firefighter in the line of duty was Box 5-5-5. So significantly was this loss felt that Box 5-5-5 was retired and replaced with a new numeric assignment. Thereafter, a Signal 5-5-5 transmitted by the fire alarm office served to notify all department personnel that a firefighter had lost their life. This is heard as five bells, a pause, five bells, a pause, and five more bells.

That tradition continues to be observed today throughout the American fire service at memorial services to recognize the loss of our brothers and sisters, ringing a fire bell to make these losses known. At First Responder Virginia, we will ring the bell to honor those lost over the years since we last gathered.

Special Thanks
