

Crepido De Los Toros Concretus

If anyone has visited California, you know how dense it can be around the southern coast and you will find that Tijuana also is part of that dynamic economic zone.

The city Tijuana has grown along the coast and along the border line but across from them you can find large open tracts of land. That would seem unusual for a densely populated southern California.

Where north meets south along the coast, it is met by an infamous iron curtain that runs into the ocean for a small distance. There obviously was not a lot of imagination for joining the north and the south by placing an iron curtain between both countries, and was only meant to seal the south against the north.

For a country that put men on the moon and is the world's largest economy, and a country to the south with the 15th largest economy, this was the best that could be done?

No imagination or city planning was done to join north and south to become an energetic, self-sustaining economic engine at this location.

What is needed now is to put away the rusting metal fence that separates the two countries and place an energetic northern and southern pier with a shared pedestrian port of entry nearby.

Let the market place determine how the area then develops across the entire borderlands of Tijuana and Imperial Beach.
