

Chartered in 1848, Lake View Lutheran was originally known as the Scandinavian Evangelical Lutheran Church and later as First Norwegian Church.

Our history reveals that our work has long nurtured urban lives at many locations throughout Chicago. Our spirit has never been bound by the neighborhoods we serve or diminished due to wind and fire's destruction of our buildings.

Acts 17:24 "The God who made the world and all things in it, since He is Lord of heaven and earth, does not dwell in temples made with hands;

Lake View Lutheran can trace its origin to a Scandinavian Lutheran mission was in operation by 1843, with some information leading us to believe it was as early as 1834.

The Scandinavian Lutheran mission began construction on a building on Superior Street, between LaSalle & Wells. The nearly-completed structure was destroyed by a wind storm and the congregation lacked funds to start it over. In distress, they called to theological student Paul Anderson (for whom Andersonville is named) for aid. Anderson helped the congregation formally organize as the Scandinavian Evangelical Lutheran Church of Chicago on January 6, 1848. While the Superior Street church resumed construction, the congregation met first in the Bethel Chapel on Kinzie Street (between Franklin and Kingsbury Streets). In addition to Anderson's leadership, Scandinavian Evangelical Lutheran's formation was also assisted by a grant from the Lutheran Church's local Missouri Synod and its pastor, Rev. C.A.T. Selle, was interested in work among the Scandinavian immigrants in the city

Records show services and Sunday School were conducted in English in 1848. In 1852, a group of Swedish immigrants, stranded in Chicago, were aided by Pastor Anderson. They chose to remain in Chicago and the congregation helped them organize a Swedish Lutheran Church. For a time the two congregations worshiped jointly, but ultimately the Swedes bought the property on Superior Street from the Norwegians in 1855.

Dedicated in 1855 on the corner of Erie and Franklin Streets, the new church was home to the newly-named Norwegian Evangelical Lutheran Church of Chicago and was nearly destroyed in the Chicago Fire of 1871.

After the fire, many Scandinavians had relocated throughout Chicago, especially to the North and West Sides. This informed the congregation's decision to move to the North Side. Members on the South Side were encouraged to join Our Savior Lutheran.

The North Side membership purchased lots in 1891 at Osgood (now Kenmore) and Roscoe Streets, in the Lakeview. A church building (which now houses a mosque) was purchased from Ravenswood Methodist Church at Hermitage and Sunnyside Avenues and moved two miles to Osgood and Roscoe.

In 1922, the congregation voted to join the Norwegian Lutheran Church in America. In 1958, the popularly-used name Lake View Lutheran Church was formally adopted.

In 1960, a new, larger building was constructed at 835 W. Addison Street at Reta Street. The first service was conducted in this current location in November 1961.
