FEATHERS IN THE WIND

Even in the 1950s we were still saying German words differently from one town to another or even using completely different words to refer to the same object. (Of course, we, in Homestead, were using the correct words, but we humored people from the other villages with their strange pronouciation.)

I still remember how Barbara Ruedy and I argued over how to the word for "Paring knife." In Middle Amana, where she lived, this item was a Schälmesser. In Homestead, it was a Rüstmesser I believe that jam was also pronounced differently in those two towns differently also.

The mature ladies would just ignore us and go on with life.

Things came to a head however when my Tante Lina Rettig invited our family to her house in MIDDLE for chicken and biscuits. I refused to go to such a meal never realizing that what she meant was Hühnersoße und Nudeln which was my absolutely my favorite meal. The Middle Amana term for this meal and the method of preparation were just different. My mother and I had a knock down drag out fight about going to Tante's because I was not going to eat this chicken and biscuit dinner which, to me, sounded terrible. We were sure the other person understood what the "dish" was. In desperation, I even suggested that I would stay home and eat sardines. Mother won out, and I rode sullenly in the back seat all the way to Middle, expecting total misery.

We finally went but I promised myself that I would only eat the smallest portion. Needless to say when I found my mistake I had two helpings and apologized to my mother.

AMANA NEWS AND NOTES

Wind Turbine Discussion Leads to Possible County Ordinance

Public outcry in Iowa County over the construction of a wind turbine farm in Iowa County led to a public informational meeting in Williamsburg last week and a sometimes heated discussion at the June 14 Iowa County Board of Supervisors meeting.

Nearly 300 residents attended the meeting June 13 at the Williamsburg Recreation Center hosted by an Iowa County group called, Iowa County Wind Education.

The Diamond Trail Wind Turbine Project is to be located west of Williamsburg and south of Ladora and is to encompass an 80,000 acre area on which 78 wind turbines are to be constructed. These turbines will be the tallest in the state – between 500 and 600 feet tall. The project is being developed by Invenergy.

The Iowa County Supervisors caught flak for not encouraging more public discussion and comment on the project. They were also asked why no plan or ordinance was in place to deal with wind turbine development requests given the work done in other counties.

"We can easily say that a majority of the residents in Iowa County did not know about the wind turbines coming in to the county until about a month ago," said Abby Maas, an Iowa County resident. She was quoted in a Williamsburg Journal Tribune story about the June 13 rec center meeting. She added that "We are not here to tell landowners what to do with their property, we only would like for them to have all the facts before they sign an agreement with Invenergy. . ." It was reported that apparently about 300 Iowa County landowners have signed an agreement with the wind turbine developers.

At the meeting several presentations were given and questions were asked regarding health concerns, wind turbine noise levels, shadow flicker, visual appearance, impact to quality of life, impact to wildlife, affect on property values and possible damage to local roads, field tile systems, liability questions and what happens in future to the turbines should the company be sold or the technology change.

Proponents of an Iowa County-wide wind turbine ordinance state on their Facebook page, Iowa County Wind Education, that a county ordinance is needed so that the companies who build the turbines don't leave Iowa County tax payers with the added burden of costs to maintain country roads to and from turbines and also to address concerns about the future of the structures. For example, who removes the structures (decommissioning) once they are past their useful life? What happens if the company no longer exists or has been sold to another entity? Is the landowner liable? These questions need to be addressed, the group maintains.

They are particularly concerned because many farm landowners are not residents of the county and may not know their neighbors or be inclined to consider fully the impact to a neighborhood's property values, home resale value, roads, farming practices or field tiles.

Worries about health concerns were cited several times at the meeting.

The next morning a group of county residents appeared at the Iowa County Supervisor's regular meeting (June 14) to voice their concerns. They asked the Supervisors for more information about the current project and to draft an ordinance protecting land owners and the county in the future.

The Board of Supervisors discussed how to proceed with writing an ordinance regulating wind turbines. They said they would be following up with three public readings of any proposed ordinance. John Gahring and Kevin Heitshusen committed to working with assistant county attorney Lou McMeen to draw up an ordinance.

Whether an ordinance passed now would have any impact upon the project now underway was a question raised at the meeting.

Regardless, proponents urged that an ordinance would help regulate future projects and must be addressed now, if only to insure that any future projects are handled in a transparent manner with time built into the process for public input.

According to the Williamsburg Journal Tribune article, the June 14 meeting "often became contentious with raised voices and accusations flying as tempers flared."

According to posts on the Iowa County Wind Education Facebook page, some county residents believe that no more windmills should be built in Iowa County and cite a number of reasons for this stand including the burden to taxpayers for the wind energy developments and the potential such turbines may have to lower resale values on homes that neighbor them.

Others point to concerns for health and the altering of visual sight lines and rural landscapes as reasons for not allowing wind turbine construction.

Some who have posted on the group's Facebook page or spoke at meetings, believe that if they are to be allowed, any ordinance should include specifically stated set backs to protect residents from having wind turbines built too close to their home and property.

They add that an ordinance should have provision to protect contract holders (those on whose land the turbine sits) and neighbors whose property, field tiles or field drainage are damaged during construction or maintenance of the turbines.

Others believe an ordinance should take into account how neighboring farming practices, (specifically the application of farm products from the air) will be changed, along with the impact to property valuation, property taxes and resale value of neighboring properties. It should also have provision for the additional costs of maintaining country roads used in the project. Furthermore, they ask that every such project have an agreed upon plan on file as to what will happen when the turbines need to be removed or altered.

Some of these points are addressed in zoning ordinance in place in Johnson, Dallas, Adair, Monona, Monroe, O'Brien and Palo Alto counties. The group has compiled information about ordinances like this in other counties in Iowa.

The Iowa County Wind Education group is asking the public to contact the Iowa County Supervisors with their questions and concerns about wind turbines in Iowa County.
