“Charlotte”

2012- Feb. 22, 2024

Charlotte was the only dog I have ever felt sad about. She was a rescue. I didn't get her till she was seven years old and I always wish that I could've given her a better life much sooner.

It was like her spirit was crushed, and it never came back. I would catch glimpses of her, allowing herself to feel happy, but it was never for a long period of time. Like she would roll in the snow and be happy and then she would shut down again.

Very hard on my heart that one. She was 12 and had mammary cancer. DM. I had her for 4.5 years
She will be missed forever...

Interesting facts...

They Can Smell Human Emotions

We all know that dogs can smell a treat—or your chicken dinner—from what seems like a mile away, but research suggests that a dog's sense of smell can pick up a whole lot more than food (or wild animals, garbage, or your son's dirty socks).

A dog's nose can also detect fear or even sadness because our canine counterparts can pick up on the scent of adrenaline—also known as the “fight-or-flight” hormone. When it comes to “smelling your fear,” an increased heart rate and blood flow sends distinctive body chemicals to the surface of our skin, which a dog can sense almost immediately.

Your Dog Thinks You (and Your Friends) Smell

Even though most humans shower regularly and attempt to cover up natural body odors with products like deodorant and perfume, there's no hiding your unique scent from a dog. And, yes, that's even why many dogs will greet you (or, more embarrassingly, your friends or relatives) with a nose directly to the groin region, which is rich in apocrine sweat glands that produce pheromones that convey important social information to your pooch.

So that's why man's best friend is often relied on as service or emotional support animals, as they can be trained to “smell” anxiety attacks or other adverse events in their human. Dogs have also been known to “smell” diseases, including cancer, as they leave specific odor signatures in a human's body and bodily secretions, like their sweat, breath, or urine.

Your Dog's Breed Can Determine How Powerful Their Nose Is

While all dogs have millions of scent receptors buried deep within their noses, not all dogs are equal when it comes to their sense of smell—and it doesn't always have to do with how large the breed. For example, Dachshunds have about 125 million olfactory receptors, but bloodhounds have more than double that amount with around 300 million scent receptors, which is why they're often called upon for tracking purposes. Breeds such as German Shepherds (which are a popular choice for service animals) fall somewhere in the middle with about 225 million. Just to better explain how impressive those numbers are, by comparison, the nose of a human contains only five million scent receptors.

A Dog's Nostril Is a Complex Machine

We know that dogs (and, typically, animals in general) have a stronger sense of smell than humans because their noses are structured differently. But dogs also have different methods of breathing than we do; for example, each of a dog's nostrils contains separate openings for breathing in and out, and they also operate independently (meaning that they can pick up on an array of smells that are coming from different directions).

Additionally, humans don't tend to walk around with their noses to the ground, and dogs will deeply investigate every smell they encounter with numerous sniffs—in fact, a dog can sniff at least five to six times per second).
