

TBI Recovery Through Photos

This police incident photo shows the damage my head made on the car windscreen following our collision. My bicycle is beneath the car's front grill.

Anecdote: I'd kept my bicycle helmet in our shed for perhaps five years. I never wore it, as I'd always thought "accidents only happen to other people." My life partner (Ruth) pestered me endlessly, such that I eventually began wearing my helmet - about a month prior to my accident.

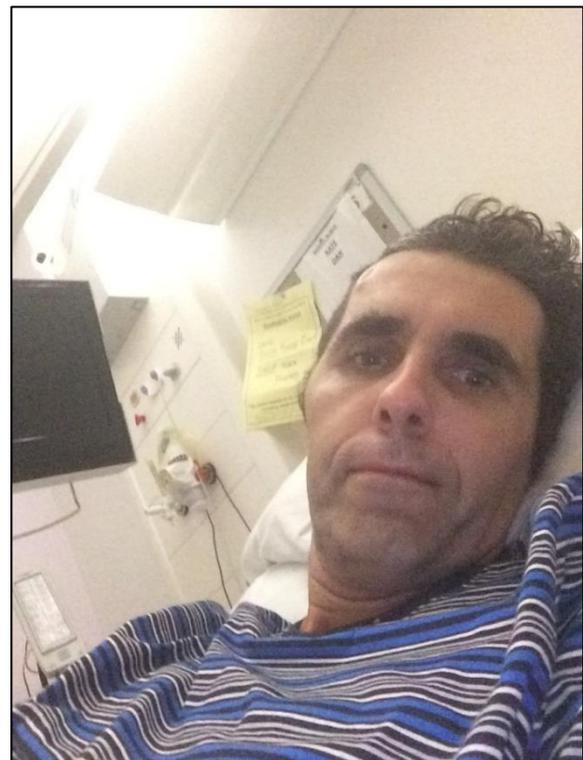

My first conscious awareness was in the rehabilitation centre. Ruth had made the note shown here and fastened it to the wall by my hospital bed. I enjoyed reading it immensely, both for the information it conveyed and knowing that it had been typed with her fingers.

Anecdote: Six years later, I still love to read the note at least once a week.

Timeline

- TBI on 31.07.2015
- Comatose from 31.07.2015 to 27.08.2015
- Locked-in syndrome from 27.08.2015 to 03.09.2015
- Rehab centre from 25.09.2015 to 04.11.2015
- Discharged home on 04.11.2015

I took this selfie on my mobile phone on 30.09.2015, it was probably my first independent activity in hospital beyond washing and dressing.

Friday 2nd October 2015

Ruth here @ 9am on a Friday.
 Caught end of occupational therapist tests for standing, walking, turning, etc.
 Went over to Hospital for eye tests in ambulance just after nine. Felt I did everything satisfactorily. Tests were finished about 10.45, then had an appointment with Ruth regarding my planning back @ main healthfield centre. There was a cock up with the ambulances, so ended up not getting back until 3pm. A long wait for me but must have been reasonably tedious for Ruth.
 When we did eventually arrive Les Phillips was in healthfield reception so it was lovely to catch up with him.
 Ruth was very patient and pleasant throughout and really lovely. - digging a deep hole in my heart.
 Labor on Olivia came as well as Charles. They were both a great fun so it felt like a lovely family experience. I should count my lucky stars.

I was well enough to be making handwritten diaries by 02.10.2015, while I was still bed-bound. I'm particularly proud of the last sentence - "I should count my lucky stars."

Anecdote: I wrote the name of the rehabilitation centre down incorrectly - it was Haywood, not Heathfield. In 2021 I still can't recall the name Haywood directly from memory - I use the tactic of knowing that it's a similar name to my local estate agents - Heywoods.

This is a favourite picture of mine from when my daughter (Olivia) visited me and played in my wheelchair. Olivia hadn't seen me since before my TBI, eight weeks earlier. My family had decided that if I wasn't to 'make it', they didn't want her last memories of me to be disturbing. Olivia's told me that she spent the school holidays of August and September 2015 brooding in her bedroom.

Anecdote: Olivia first visited me on 27.09.2015, the day before her eleventh birthday. I don't recall the visit, but she has since told me that she hardly recognised my face. She had a surprise birthday party at school on the following day - she burst into tears at the thought of celebrating and ran home.

This photo was of me feeling pleased with myself during a home based occupational therapist session in 2016. I had made some scones - after planning what ingredients I'd need, organising the mixing utensils and then putting the mixtures in the oven on the correct temperature for the designated period of time.

This photo was taken at my local library in early 2017. I volunteered as an IT buddy - a role which I simply adored. In July 2017 I returned to 'proper' work in my previous job as an IT security consultant with the Met Police, who I'd been working for at the time of my TBI.

Anecdote: I retired in 2019 after having a satisfying career. However, none of my professional roles gave me anywhere near the feelings of fulfilment which I experienced as an IT buddy. I loved it so much that I am now (2021) an IT buddy again, with a local charity for the elderly.
