

Alexis Davis is a Policy Analyst and Center on Budget and Policy Priorities State Policy Fellow at Florida Policy Institute in Orlando, focusing primarily on state immigration issues. While originally hailing from the Chicago suburbs, Alexis has lived in Florida for more than 20 years and understands the state's unique threats and opportunities. Alexis holds a Master of Science in Social Administration from Case Western Reserve University — a macro social work degree emphasizing policy practice and social change. She also holds a Bachelor of Science in Psychology from University of Central Florida and brings several years' experience as a university research assistant to her career.

Alexis' career path began with direct service to vulnerable populations, then shifted to policy and advocacy once she witnessed the damaging effects of misguided laws and funding. She has worked with the child welfare population, young adults experiencing homelessness, individuals recovering from substance use disorder, and isolated older adults. Alexis also served as Legislative Chair for the Central Florida unit of the National Association of Social Workers (NASW) and is currently a Delegate to NASW National and founding member of NASW-FL's Immigration Justice Task Force.

In her "free time," Alexis likes to sing/play music and relax with her husband and pets.
