FEATHERS IN THE WIND

It was the early 1950s and I was in second grade. My classmate, Pamela Geiger, had moved into a new ranch style home complete with a fireplace and a mother from Texas, while I remained in an old Amana home with oil space heaters. To add insult to injury, she had red hair and had gotten a boxer dog which, the second grade mafia decided, everyone should have. Unfortunately, our parents did not agree.

Eisenhower was president and he would interrupt my television programs with some of the most boring speeches known to mankind. Then, he made matters worse by changing the "Pledge of Allegiance," adding the phrase "under God." I believed in God, but I was seven and had just gotten used to the cadence of pledge, and now this change. Honestly, the man was not making me happy. I did not like Ike.

In school, we had been divided into reading groups – the red birds, blue birds, and the sparrows. I was not in the top group, and my mother was unhappy, so, after school, she practiced reading with me. Her blood pressure would raise in frustration and I would eventually be in tears. Funny that I would grow up to be a librarian, but that is another story.

The final blow for second grade year was this program to commemorate the arrival of the first Amana settlers. When you are seven, you do not pay that much attention to such things, even if your uncle and grandpa talk about the festivities constantly.

For the commemoration, the lower elementary classes had to learn a song, which seemed to be some sort of funeral march or dirge to me. It was slow and ponderous. Frankly, I doubt that few of us understood the meaning, but for days and weeks we rehearsed until that fateful day when we sat on the bleachers as a group, then stood and sang. For years thereafter the song gave me a headache when I heard it. Now that I am older, however, I realize that the words are quite meaningful. The song is "Faith of Our Fathers."
