MUELLER AND HIS REPORT: SOME THINGS DON'T MAKE SENSE

By Steve Bakke  June 5, 2019

There's much angst among Congressional democrats because Attorney General Barr won't release the entire confidential Trump/Russia election conspiracy report to the House of Representatives – unredacted and with underlying evidence. Barr is facing contempt charges, and it matters little that he's probably prohibited by law from releasing the requested information, and then there's a problem with legitimate claims of executive privilege. In contrast, these zealous anti-Trumpers strenuously object to Trump giving Barr authority to declassify information relative to the original basis and justification for the Russian election tampering probe. They don't want a cover-up.....until they do.

And, it seems standards of proof change for investigations of Trump. Senator Feinstein (along with others) stated: "Not a single revelation in the Steele dossier has been refuted." In this case, presumed innocence has morphed into: "allegations are true until proven false." Similarly, Mueller tried to represent his job was to exonerate Trump of obstruction (not a prosecutor's role) rather than to discover evidence of guilt.

Mueller is as a person who avoids the spotlight. Yet, his tortured choice of words for explaining his "inability to exonerate," guarantees unwanted publicity and pressure to testify further.

Obviously, things aren't what they're represented to be.
