FEATHERS IN THE WIND

I have never been accused of looking forward to winter. Oh sure, as a student, the hope of school being called off because of bad weather was appealing. Then there were the holidays such as Christmas, New Year's, and even Valentine's Day that seemed to bring some cheer but, let's face it: Winter meant cold, lots of ugly coats, boots, slick roads, dirty snow and, of course, semester tests.

Now, here comes 2024 and really dumps winter upon us, making even those of us who believe in global warming beginning to question if we are wrong.

During the past few years, I have become a real recluse and stay indoors, but these past few weeks have made me want to get out. I feel totally trapped by the snow, ice, and cold weather. I have taken to modeling my "fashionable" flannel clothes and getting as many blankets out as is possible. I feel like a "greased pig" with all the lotion that I have rubbed onto my dry, chapped skin.

Charlemagne is getting used to my loud coughing which is always followed with a series of sneezes. He knows exactly where to find me by the trail of tissues that I leave in my wake. Yes, I do clean up, but when I am wrapped in my wool blanket and sitting in my chair, getting up to throw away a tissue or two seems like too much trouble at the time. So, instead, I poke them beside the chair for a later date.

To make matters worse our beloved cat, "Puff," disappeared. Well, that is a euphemism for died. I actually knew something was wrong because he had stopped grooming himself a while back, among other things.

Charlemagne had figured that Puff would soon 'shuffle off his mortal coil', so he had already dug a grave. According to him, cats usually go and find a quiet place to die, so it took a while for him to find Puff in the basement. He buried the cat and, of course, shed a few tears before telling me. I have never been a great fan of cats, but I sure do miss them when they are not around to harass me.

I want spring to come and have again. Charlemagne has decreed no more cats for us, but even I would like another one right now.
