

Building psychological and emotional positivity in teams

It is almost impossible to overstate the likely psychological and emotional impact of the recent coronavirus pandemic. The level of change, uncertainty and personal risk combined with a lengthy period of social isolation will affect people in different ways and the consequences may not be fully realised for some time. As well as strong navigational leadership, people will need time, space and support to reconcile their individual and collective experiences, make sense of how the world has changed, reconnect with each other and redefine their own direction and expectations.

Our team coaching programme provides teams with a psychologically and emotionally positive foundation, helping them move purposefully into this new era of opportunity. Using principles of positive psychology, systemic coaching and Nancy Kline's 'Thinking Environment', participants will:

- Take time to reflect on what can be learned from recent experiences and to focus on the positives.
- Within the boundaries of a psychologically safe environment, share thoughts, feelings and experiences associated with the coronavirus pandemic.
- Communicate with each other in a way that raises morale and personal connection.
- Create a strengthened culture of support and inclusion.
- Re-evaluate individual and collective values and purpose.

FORMAT:

Four sessions for teams of up to 20, run virtually so participants can join from anywhere.

1. Set-up

- Establishing programme and personal objectives and outcomes.
- Agreeing ground rules for creating a psychologically safe environment.

2. Me

- Building psychological safety and trust by sharing personal experience from before and during the crisis.
- Understanding how people we know well may have changed through their own experiences.

3. Us

- Understanding what shaped personal relationships before and during the first few months of the crisis.
- Considering how personal relationships might be strengthened as we navigate towards a new normal.

4. Our team

- Reflecting on what worked well for our team, before and during the first few months of the crisis.
- Establishing new behaviours and practices based on what we've learned.