Something has changed

By Steve Bakke  September 1, 2020

Who could ever have imagined that Americans would be arguing about the importance of enforcing law and order on our city streets? I can't understand how we've come to this situation in which politicians are arguing whether we should meet violent riots, resulting in destruction of property and loss of life, with adequate force for promptly stopping the lawlessness.

Everyone knows what I'm referring to, so I won't provide examples of recent reluctance to enforce the law. What changed? When? And to what end?
