William the conqueror gave his great lords many manors scattered over the country in order that they should not have too much power in one area; but this hardly seems true for our county; for the great Hugh De Port held fifty six manors in it direct from the crown and many others indirectly. 20

The Godwines were the most powerful family in England in the first half of the 11th century. During the long reign of Edward the Confessor, Earl Godwine and his sons were the leaders of the National English Party against the growing Norman influence. It was only fitting that after the death of the Earl of Godwine, Harold the greatest of his sons, should carry on the patriotic work of his father, and when Edward died he became King 20

The land of a manor was divided into parts; demesne land, which was the lord's portion and cultivated for his own use and common land held by the peasantry under him. The peasants were divided into two main classes; the villeins who held a yard land or virgate, usually about 30 acres and the bordars or cottars who held much smaller sections. These two main classes although unfree, since they were bound to the land, were quite distant from serfs or slaves. In return for the use of the land and protection of their lord they had certain duties to perform, such as tilling demesne land and serving under him in time of war. The chief officials of any manor or manorial village were the steward representing the lord, the praepositus or reeve representing the villeins, and the baliff or farm manager. Less important offices were the Haywood, constable and pound keeper 20
