

Overly-Focused Emotions¹ & Broken Hearts²

We are all faced with situations that compel responses involving our beautiful and painful human emotions. The challenge is to know the difference between an appropriate response and a fixed pattern of repetitive reactions – which at first seem to protect our heart, but over time can result in a Broken Heart.

Sometimes anger is focused appropriately. However, the Body/Gut Center habitually reacts to all stress with anger (8), passive-aggressiveness (9), and resentment (1) towards our self or others.

Sometimes fear is the appropriate response to real danger. However, the Head Center can be overly sensitive to any perceived threats, reacting with withdrawal (5), phobic or counter-phobic behaviors (6), and distraction (7). Sometimes we need to not engage and respond in a given situation for valid reasons. However, the Heart Center regularly represses their own emotions and submits to others by responding to others' emotions (2), wanting others' approval (3), and fantasy or symbolic displacement of their true feelings (4).

¹ Emotions & the Enneagram

² Russ Hudson