

Prologue

Son Source

By
James Andrew Edske

Zachary Slenski, an environmentally concerned scientist is on the verge of developing a solar panel that will put out four times the power of any other model in the world. His Texas based company, Sun Source is financially strapped, yet only a few design modifications away from going into production of the new quad solar panels. While searching for needed venture capital, he meets up with Mr. Philip Charles Rubin from Chicago.

Mr. Rubin is not at all interested in using the sun's source, for solving the world's energy problem. Yet, he fully understands that this break through would be equivalent to a design change to cars that would allow V8 motors to get over 100 miles to the gallon. Two OPEC ministers enter the story with a fifty million dollars offer; not at all to Zachary Slenski's liking or desire to curb the thirst for oil.

So often the most dedicated scientists, soldiers, doctors and law enforcement personal put their work ahead of their own families'. It hardly seems fair that the neglected spouse and/or children have to share such a huge sacrifice; all in the hopes to make the world a better place. Zach is suddenly faced with the decision to change the world or save his marriage. Even when a convicted child molester gets too close to his six-year-old daughter Zach vacillates between relying on science or prayer to solve this enduring problem.
