Veterinary Dental Treatments

The following treatments are performed under general anesthesia:

First, a chlorhexidine solution is used to flush the mouth to reduce the bacteria present in the mouth. Next, full mouth dental radiographs are performed to determine the health of the teeth below the gum line and to note any abnormalities. The teeth and gums are evaluated and charted, then scaled, polished, and flushed below the gum line to remove debris and tartar. Fluoride is then applied to the teeth. Once teeth are cleaned we will perform any dental surgery or treatments your pet may need as deemed necessary by our veterinarian. You may choose to have us call you prior to performing these additional treatments or you may authorize us to perform these procedures as needed when you bring your pet in the morning of the prophylaxis.

IF at home dental care isn't realistic, then yearly (if not more often—depending on your pet's specific needs) in-hospital dental prophylaxis will be necessary.
