What are the motives behind the Janus Court Case?

On Monday, Feb. 26, one of the biggest labor stories in a decade unfolded as the Supreme Court heard opening arguments in Janus v. AFSCME. Both sides claim to be pro-worker; however, right-wing groups funding the lawsuit have expressed far different motives. In These Times magazine and the Center for Media and Democracy conducted a joint investigation. They found that Janus backers are intent on “defunding” and “bankrupting” unions in order to deal a “mortal blow” to labor unions in America.

To date, seventeen briefs were filed by right-wing groups in a multi-faceted, multi-million dollar, coordinated effort to defund unions and obstruct their ability to protect workers' rights. Janus is funded by the Bradley Foundation or the Koch-linked Donors Capital and Donors Trust. Bradley, ALEC, SPN and the Koch brothers' Americans for Prosperity have been key players in legislative and litigation strategies that systematically attack public sector unions in state after state. Look at what happened to teachers once Wisconsin became a “Right to Work” state. The effects were devastating for Wisconsin's teachers:

WISCONSIN EFFECT (Superior School District)

- Teachers take home pay was reduced by $8,000 in the first year.
- Teacher's health insurance deductible changed from $1,000 to $6,000 in the second year of 'Right to Work.'
- 25 additional minutes were added to each work day and three additional days were placed in the school calendar.
- Statewide, there is no longer a just cause (tenure) provision regarding employment. Districts can let teachers go at the end of each year without justification.
- Employees can no longer carry over sick days from year to year.

We Are in Desperate Need of Tradespeople

There's a growing shortage of these skilled workers that perform essential jobs. Even in a strengthening economy, more experienced and older trade workers are retiring.

Unfortunately, there aren't enough younger people poised to take their places.

If this trend continues, this could blossom into an acute skilled worker shortage that touches everyone. It will mean higher costs or delays for those building new office towers, rehabbing houses, or merely dealing with annoying, everyday emergencies like clogged pipes.

Some schools, unions and companies are working to ease the labor crunch. That's an important mission, and more organizations need to get on board.

"This could be a very large problem," says Mark Klein, co-president of Lincolnshire-based Klein Tools, which makes products for the electrical industry and electricians. "It's a huge supply and demand issue."

According to an analysis of independent research commissioned by Klein, a recent survey of more than 600 union and nonunion electricians found that 56 percent said more experienced electricians are leaving the field, compared with 44 percent in 2015.

According to the Washington D.C.-based National Association of Home Builders, 40 percent of those asked say they are concerned there won't be enough qualified electricians available to meet demand in the coming years . A similar dynamic is running through plumbing, carpentry, and other construction-related trades where the median worker age is over 40 years old and the need for new workers is building.

Why did this job crunch happen?

The Great Recession and subprime mortgage meltdown of the late 2000s and early 2010s took a toll on the economy. This economic disaster meant a loss of nearly 1.5 million construction-related jobs, with hundreds of thousand workers leaving the field for good. Many independent contractors also went out of business.

Unfortunately, building these construction businesses did not occur for various reasons. Unions, which also were reeling from related economic hardships, cut back on paid apprenticeships. That kept many young people out of the trade job pipeline.

There's another hurdle to attracting new trade workers, lack of exposure at an early age. Due to the lack of high school shop classes and other related "build-it-yourself" experiences, students do not get a chance to envision the trades as a career option versus a four-year college degree.

We need to appreciate that some people have a talent for working with their hands and solving those daunting difficult problems that come with creating and fixing things.

Call to Action: Proposals requested for NYSUT Educator's Voice

New York State's classrooms are among the most diverse in the nation. In recognition of this, NYSUT is currently seeking article proposals on "Culturally-Responsive Teaching" for consideration in its annual edition of Educator's Voice, a Journal of Best Practices in Education. The deadline for proposals is June 15, 2018.

Do you have a project or practice that works well in your classroom, something you are passionate about and would like to share with other educators across the state? This is a great opportunity to write about it and become published in NYSUT's member journal, a publication created by NYSUT members for NYSUT members. No previous experience is needed nor do you need to be a professional writer to be published in Educator's Voice.
