

JACK NOSEWORTHY, 30, has been playing golf for 20 years. "I worked at a public golf course on weekends and had a junior membership; that's where I learned to play," says the actor. It's a passion he shares with Matthew McConaughey, his fellow star in the new movie U-571. "I had a chance to play in Rome when I was shooting U-571. It was beautiful." A veteran of film, TV and a touring production of Cats, Noseworthy, who also runs, swims, lifts weights and occasionally competes in triathlons, says he likes golf's focus. "It allows you to let everything else go, plus every time you step up to the ball it's a new game."

In the Swing Tiger Woods has made the once impossibly fusty sport of golf hip. Now, Hollywood's movers and shakers have become swingers and putters, and lounging on the links or being invited to participate in one of the several celebrity tournaments held each year is even better than sitting poolside at the Beverly Hills Hotel. Jack Nicholson, Celine Dion, Tea Leoni and Jim Carrey all spend time on the greens. Trainer Jim Barcena, from Ultimate Performance in Beverly Hills, California, routinely works with stars who are trying to better their game. "Some times you have to work indoors to enhance your outdoor activities," he explains. Golfers, in particular, have to work on strength and flexibility. Finally, Hollywooders are happy because they live next-door to golf Mecca Palm Springs, where you can't whack a long drive without hitting a course somewhere.
