Sacred Music

Sacred music is meant to enhance the liturgical celebration and to call forth a deep resonance in the hearts of the faithful. It should always be united to liturgical prayer, be marked by expressive beauty, and be conducive to the harmonious participation of the assembly at those points in the liturgy indicated by the rubrics.

In the course of her two-thousand-year history, the Church has created, and still creates, music and chants which represent a rich patrimony of faith and love, and this heritage must not be lost. Mere improvisation or the introduction of music which fails to respect the meaning of the liturgy should be avoided. Everything - texts, music, and execution - ought to correspond to the meaning of the mystery being celebrated, the structure of the rite, and the different times of the liturgical year.

While the organ is to be accorded pride of place among musical instruments, other wind, stringed, or percussion instruments may be used in liturgical services in the United States of America, according to longstanding local usage, provided they are truly apt for sacred use or can be rendered apt.

While recorded music might be used advantageously outside the liturgy as an aid in the teaching of new music, it should not, as a general norm, be used within the liturgy, for it lacks the authenticity provided by a living liturgical assembly gathered for the Sacred Liturgy. Recorded music may be used to accompany the community's song during a procession outside and, when used carefully, in Masses with children. Occasionally, it might be used as an aid to prayer; for example, during long periods of silence in a communal celebration of the Sacrament of Penance. However, recorded music should never become a substitute for the community's singing.
