2020's Hot Start may give way to a Cooler Finish to the year

by CBS 3 meteorologist Dave Anderson

When a few inches of snow fell around here on October 17th, most of us Northlanders were unconcerned. Twin Cities media, though, was all fired up that it was the earliest accumulating snow in Minnesota history. Maybe that's true for their neck of the woods, but I could swear we got usable snow in late September and early October 1982. I remember dusting off my Finnish grandmother's 1930's vintage Finn style cross country skis and running around the trails near Ely's Beacon Hill. After a week or so, the snow melted and we had to wait a few more weeks before it came back for real.

There's a chance the snow we got on the 17th will do the same trick - go away briefly and then come back. This talk about snow sure is a change from the way 2020 rolled for the first eight months. Much of Minnesota has cooled down and become wetter after those eight months of warm and dry conditions. In October, near normal rain totals started to come across along with that early season snow. That trend just might continue in November. Those people "skilled" in long range forecasting think the month will be near the Upper Midwest normal for temperature which is an average of 29 degrees.

They also think rain will continue to come down at a normal rate, which means three inches. The old ten to one rule of thumb says that could be 30" of snow if it all comes down in that form!

The 1st to the 7th should be cold with just a little snow. The 8th to 11th should be sunny and mild which will set us up for a long cold and snowy period from the 12th to 26th. Finally, November should end with a warm spell from the 27th to 30th.

The folks at Old Farmer's Almanac have released their winter prognostication and it indicates our region will be both cold and snowy this year. That would mean a cool finish to 2020 after a long, warm start.
