1) 'Missing tombs': the allure of the hidden and what might yet be revealed

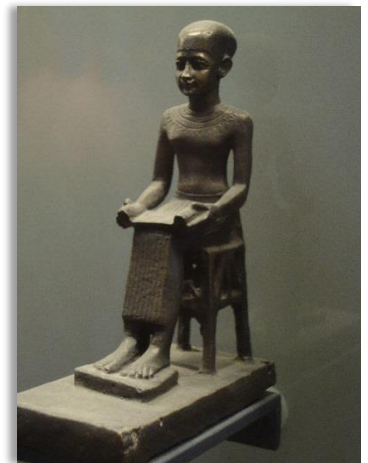

What do we mean by 'missing' tombs? Of whom? And where might they be? What is it about the idea that there might be something hidden that archaeologists will one day find that we all find so fascinating? This is the story of some wonderful monuments that must at one time have existed, but which have yet to be discovered. Just as importantly, it's also the story of some of the archaeologists who have tried to find them, and the tension between treasure hunting and serious archaeology.

2) Case studies: Imhotep, Akhenaten, Nefertiti and Cleopatra

Imhotep must have been buried at Saqqara, mustn't he? Why has his tomb never been found? Was it among the enormous but anonymous mastabas discovered by Bryan emery in the 1960s? Or will those massive rectangular shapes that have been seen in recent geophysical surveys provide the answer?

Akhenaten was buried at Amarna wasn't he? Well in that case whose mummy was it that was found in KV 55? And where was Nefertiti buried? There's no evidence of her interment at Amarna, but her burial equipment seems to have been extensively plundered for use by Tutankhamun... The Valley of the Kings hasn't yet been completely excavated... What might still be there?

Cleopatra's tomb has never been found despite the detailed descriptions left to us by the classical authors. Were they all wrong about the burial however? Did Cleopatra leave orders that she should be buried in association with Isis in a temple dedicated to the goddess with whom she identified? Might the excavations at that temple lead to a sensational discovery?
