

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

D-DAY: OBAMA WOULD WAIT! and THEN HE'D ANNOUNCE THE DETAILS!

By Stephen L. Bakke  June 1, 2014

Here's what provoked me:

Obama likes to create a committee or commission to study an important potential policy, legislation or decision. He often does this to delay an obvious and inevitable decision he doesn't want to make. I noticed a letter that cleverly placed Obama back in the time leading up the Normandy Invasion. The writer questioned whether Obama would have been able to make that decision on a timely basis. I took it one step further, bringing in what I think is another bad habit – Obama's penchant for telegraphing his intentions.

Here's my response:

He'd wait! And then he'd announce the details!

Regarding the letter "Would Obama Wait?" which appeared on June 1. Mike Mueller poses the question about the approaching commemoration of D-Day – the Normandy Invasion. He asks: "I have to wonder if President Obama had to make the decision to invade would to this day our troops still be in England as he waits for the full investigation to conclude before determining whether we should attack."

To which I respond: He'd definitely have to study it, and then, if he decided, he'd probably announce the details in advance!
