Margaret Powers was at right during rockshelter excavation in 1956 was one of the reviewers and was in charge of the Wyoming Archaeological Society's ability to conduct fieldwork and to be an active participant in the first chapter in Wyoming. She was involved in establishing the first chapter and was a leader and major archeological investigations. The final chapter of the Wyoming basin in Montana began her tenure. In 1962, the Wyoming Association of Professional Archeologists established a service award to recognize individuals who have made an outstanding contribution to Wyoming archeology. Margaret was the first recipient of the award, a outstanding leader and major contributor to the archeological profession.

James Allen was a white sketch artist in Cody, Wyoming in 1910. His findings are important for understanding the relationship between the native peoples and the early European settlers. His sketches were instrumental in documenting the history of the Cody area.

What are some of the contributions of archeologists? Archeologists contribute to our understanding of human history by uncovering artifacts and remains. Some of these contributions include:

- Preservation of Artifacts: Archeologists work to preserve and protect artifacts found at excavation sites. This includes cleaning, documenting, and storing artifacts for future study.
- Archival Research: Archeologists use their findings to create detailed records that can be used by future researchers. These records often include maps, photographs, and written descriptions of sites.
- Education and Outreach: Archeologists often work to educate the public about the importance of preserving cultural heritage. They may give lectures, lead tours, or develop educational materials for schools and museums.

To learn more about archeology, it is important to support the work of archeologists and organizations that promote archeological research. Some ways to do this include donating funds to archeological organizations, volunteering at dig sites, and attending lectures or seminars on archeological topics.
