

In the first interview, they told him he was the least experienced and least qualified of the candidates they interviewed...so how did he get the job?

My youngest took a break from college in the Spring. After an extended vacation, he decided to get a job. He picked a company he wanted to work for, found a position he thought he was perfect for, and applied. They called him in for an interview with the junior HR recruiter and he went absolutely confident they would make him an offer on the spot.

When he came home he was pretty dejected. No offer, not only that, they told him he was the least experienced and least qualified (no college degree yet) of the candidates they were interviewing.

Nevertheless, Yesterday he got the job. He is in good company. His older siblings, using the same techniques, have also gotten offers (which they accepted) from every company they chose to interview.

How did he do it? Simple, he took his father's advice from the book The Peak Interview.

As an author of self help books, I can tell you there is nothing more rewarding than having my kids actually take my advice, and then be uniformly successful applying it. Today, I am doubly happy, my son has a job, and I had a minor role in that!
