

GAMING FOR ALL

BY MELISSA HART

FLASHING LIGHTS. Small text. No subtitles. These are a few of the features that can make video games really hard for some kids to play. That's why the gamer Courtney Craven started Can I Play That?, a website that reviews video games for people with disabilities and teaches developers how to create more accessible games.

Craven, who is nonbinary and uses they/them pronouns, lost their hearing in both ears several years ago, which made it harder to play video games that relied on sounds as cues. It also made the games less fun to play: "If controls aren't accessible, if subtitles are poorly done," Craven says, "disabled kids won't get to experience any of the benefits."

On Can I Play That?, video games are reviewed by gamers with disabilities