South Africa And The U.S.

We have read many different articles relating to the conflict in South Africa. The controlled news media in this country only shows the plight of the Blacks in the same manner as they do for those living here in the United States. They repeatedly show the killing of Blacks by Blacks and blame the problem on the Whites. Of course, we all know that it is much more complicated than that.

We are including an article from the very well written newsletter entitled The American Freedom Movement, P.O. Box 309, Irwin, PA 15642. The author of the newsletter is Charles A. Provan M.D. Subscription $24 per year.

"There is no question that the South African government is in the final stage of turning the nation of South Africa over to the Communist head of the African National Congress (ANC), Nelson Mandela, and the South African Communist Party (SACP). The final step is the installation of the Transitional Executive Council (TEC). This TEC will give the ANC a major say in governing the country. The TEC will control the security forces of SA, the electoral process and the media. There will be a war! No ifs, buts, or maybes. It is said that the freedom loving South Africans will make their move just as the communists are about to take over the security forces."

"The ANC only has about 500,000 people supporting it. The South African Communist Party has about 50,000."

"Opposed to these communists will be Dr. Buthelezi's Inkatha Freedom Party which can muster a half-million men, and General Viljoen's former soldiers who fought under him when he was head of the South African Defense Force. A good estimate of the general's strength is 700,000."

"This whole scenario is and will be a tragedy. This has all come about primarily because of the United States State Department. At the present time the United States is using your tax dollars to build not one, but three air force bases in Botswana under the sanction of the United Nations and France. In January 1992, 300 members of the U.S. 325th Infantry Brigade conducted desert warfare training in Botswana. President Clinton is prepared to send American troops to fight against Christian whites and blacks in SA to assure the Communists will attain power over the country of South Africa. This will be the same as Bosnia, only worse!"

"In recent weeks, there have been secret meetings between Moscow and the ANC-SACP to form an alliance on the supply of minerals to the rest of the world. This will place the entire industrialized nations of the West at the mercy of these Communists. Hardline Russian nationalists are on the rise in Russia, and they would like nothing more than to cut strategic minerals off for the West. The recent election in Russia is a tremendous example of the fact that `Communism is NOT dead'."

"Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn told the New York Times on November 28, 1993, "Communism is far from dead on the territory of the former Soviet Union. In some republics, its institutional structures have survived in their entirety, while in all of them millions of Communist cadres remain in reserve, and its roots remain embedded in the consciousness and the daily life of the people."

"In a surprise move, the South African military material manufacturer AMSCOR has named as its director of communications a former member of the armed branch of the African National Congress. This man, Yacoob Abba Omar, had been a hunted terrorist wanted by SA police for years. He returned to SA after DeKlerk made the ANC a legal party. Omar will now have a seat on AMSCOR's executive Management Council."

"This whole new war may start at any time. Be prepared for it!" End of quotes from The American Freedom Movement.

There are several very important observations that we can make from the South African situation. It is obvious that the South African people have many more freedoms than we do in the United States. Can you imagine what would happen here if it were world-wide common knowledge that a retired American General had under his command 700,000 American ex-GIs to be used in a civil war against Communists and a government that wants to turn the country over to them? Can you imagine what would happen if even ten men gathered together to discuss what could be physically done about our government merging with Communists to create a joint government? Are the American people really as concerned about freedom and liberty as the South Africans?

Designer Viruses

Lesson In History Part 24

"For nothing is secret, that shall not be made manifest; neither any thing hid, that shall not be known and come abroad." (Luke 8:17)

As we review the past Intelligence Newsletters we can see that an emphasis was placed on the relationships between the governments of England and the United States. We have shown, with historical evidence, that there truly has been a conspiracy to enslave the entire world with much of the leadership centered in England. We have shown that the English people have not been their own masters in this matter. We have shown that an element of the nobility and the wealthy of Europe have played a part in that conspiracy, also.

Reading those newsletters could give the impression that we here at Christian Crusade for Truth are from a far away land that has no feelings for the United States and its English people. It is quite the contrary. This writer's name itself is Welsh and our ancestors came to the United States from Wales and Germany starting in the early 1600's. My wife's ancestors also came from Scotland, England and France starting in the early 1600's. We love this country with a love that is excelled by no one.

It would be much more pleasant not to write about this conspiracy but we must. It is our constant prayer, "Please God, turn our people back to you so that you will once again bless this country. God bless America!"

As we review that conspiracy, we can see that we have ignored President Washington's admonition made in his farewell speech, "Do not become entangled in foreign affairs!" Why did we go to Somalia? Why did we go to Iraq? Why did we deal with Iran? Why were we in Vietnam, Korea, WWII, WWI, etc.? Was it to make the world safe for "democracy" or was it to secure a fascist type, communistic world-wide dictatorship?

As a part of revealing that conspiracy, the January- February, 1992 issue of the Intelligence Newsletter discussed the approximately one million German prisoners of war who were deliberately allowed to die because of exposure, sickness, dehydration and lack of food. This was done by the American and French armies just following WWII while these prisoners of war were in concentration camps along the Rhine River. The details of this violation of Geneva Rules for Warfare was described in the book entitled Other Losses by James Bacque, Stoddart Publishing Co. 34 Lesmill Road, Toronto, Canada M3B2T6, price $26.95.

There was nothing said about this by the media nor was it discussed at the Nuremberg trials. This is but one example of atrocities that occurred that made a mockery of the Nuremberg trials but it pales in comparison to the subject that will be discussed in this issue.

The Nuremberg trials of German leaders was a first in the annals of military history. It was not because trials of war criminals had not been accomplished before but it was because two new concepts of war crimes were developed to cover the alleged massive killings of Jews in Europe. The Allies proposed two new categories, "crimes against peace and against humanity." Crimes against peace were defined as "planning, preparation, initiation or waging a war of aggression, or war in violation of international treaties, agreements or assurances, or participation in a common plan or conspiracy for the accomplishment of any of the foregoing." Crimes against humanity were defined as "inhumane acts committed against any civilian population, before or during the war."

Recently, for some unknown reason, the United States government has been very open in its discussion of experiments, using human beings that have been done by the defense department to test LSD and other exotic mind-altering drugs. They have also revealed that they initiated experiments at the Nevada Nuclear Test Site where they detonated nuclear bombs at a discreet distance from observers, military and civilians, to determine the immediate and lasting effects caused by nuclear radiation. As a result of those tests, many citizens living in towns in the area down wind from the blasts also received damaging radiation. Rancher's animals were also destroyed in the process but the government denied the connection.

The use of exotic drugs on American citizens and intentionally exposing American citizens to nuclear radiation also has resulted in premature deaths of many victims and much suffering by others. The government has been very lax in responding to their needs and compensating for the losses. But this sad commentary on the government's respect for its citizens is also dwarfed by an even more heinous art of killing.

A situation is developing that has the potential of killing more people than the plague of the middle ages, the influenza plague of the World War I era and the Cholera plagues of the near East, all combined. That situation is the intentional use of deadly viruses and known killer germs for purposes of warfare. The argument could be given that this type of warfare is only a remote possibility and that it is being tightly controlled by the world governmental bodies. Is it really? What is the history of this? Is it even possible that such a man-made plague could be used for a strategic purpose in this country? Let us study the evidence. This issue will be a history lesson and an intelligence evaluation combined.

The use of Bacteriological Warfare, was being studied by all of the major combatants during WWII. When our government determined that the Axis Powers, as well as Russia, were evaluating this weapon, it became necessary to study the possibilities. This led to the thought that there were two sides to the coin. If one prepared for offensive bacteriological warfare, then one must also prepare for defensive bacteriological warfare.

The same thought process and the same moral evaluation was used to make this determination as was made in the use of nuclear bombs for more efficient killing. It can be reasoned that if the United States possessed a bacteriological capability, both offensive and defensive, that would be a deterrent to any other power using it first.

So far, so good, but that reasoning broke down with the first use by the United States of nuclear weapons in Japan to finish the war in the East quickly. Without question, that action saved an untold number of lives calculated to be lost by both the United States and Japan if a land attack on the islands was effected. But the principle is obvious. Would we do the same thing with viruses and bacteria? Would we even use "Designer Viruses" on our own citizens for a political purpose? Let us continue.

In 1939 the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research in New York was studying the virulent, unmodified strain of yellow fever virus, ostensibly for the purpose of developing cures for the disease. The laboratory at that time was under the direction of Dr. Wilbur Sawyer. It was in 1939 that a Japanese Army doctor, named Dr. Ryoichi Naito, visited the laboratory with credentials from the Japanese military attache in Washington to obtain a sample of that strain of the Yellow Fever virus.

A report was written of that incident and sent to the Army Surgeon General. Subsequently, after other similar incidents, the Army Intelligence staff was appraised and they admitted that Japan was interested in the yellow fever virus for bacteriological warfare purposes.

Based on that information, along with much other corollary information, the decision was made to build Fort Detrick, near Frederick, Maryland. This installation was built with the utmost of secrecy and its purpose was to provide a laboratory to study and develop the offensive and defensive capability to wage bacteriological warfare (BW). The secrecy of the project was of the same magnitude as the nuclear work done within the Manhattan Project. From the writings and speeches given by the military men associated with this project, it is apparent that they were genuinely concerned for our nation's security. But as we shall see, inside of this organization and within the government at large, the potential for ulterior motives can be recognized.

During WWII, incidents occurred that heightened the anxiety and whetted the appetite for more study. The Japanese apparently tried to poison the water supply of Los Angeles with yellow fever virus but the project failed. In 1941, a Japanese plane dropped plague infected wheat and rice on China. The plague germs turned out to be bubonic but did not spread significantly. However, here was the first example of intentional bacteriological warfare, used by Japan against the Chinese. Numerous local citizens observed the plane dropping the objects and picked some up and turned them over to the authorities. The wheat and rice mixture, along with pieces of paper and cotton wadding, which was dropped from the Japanese airplane, was studied by the local U.S. Presbyterian hospital. The hospital's laboratory determined that it contained bubonic plague germs.

Britain was also interested in studying BW and actually preceeded the United States in doing so. As early as 1936 they recognized that Germany was also studying this most terrifying of all types of warfare. However, as good as the British Intelligence was, the official report stated that Germany was active but no mention of Japan was made. Was this a harbinger of things to come?

It is prudent to show that the British assessment was clouded. Most of those associated with the evaluation of BW within their government were undoubtedly as sincere as their American counterparts. However, the All India Institute of Hygiene and Public Health in Calcutta evaluated the evidence of the Japanese raid. Based on that evidence the British evaluators totally discounted the China incident as probably not even happening. This assessment does not ring true considering the quality of their intelligence establishment. Remember, India had always been used by elements in Britain for "extra- governmental" affairs. There were additional incidents that were ignored by the British and the incoming reports were considered "tiresome."

By 1944, more than sufficient evidence had been gathered by the American intelligence units that Japan was truly involved in bacteriological warfare. The scope of their activities was large. They manufactured 30,000 bombs, which were sent to the Chinese front containing typhus, diphtheria and bubonic plague. These were made at the Osaka Chemical Research Institute in Japan.

By now, overwhelming evidence was coming in. A significant bit of information was received that a Maj. Gen. Ishii was awarded a Technical Meritorious Medal with highest degrees. Gen. Ishii's name will play a most important part with respect to the relationship between Japan and the United States in the years that followed. One should perhaps ponder if that relationship still exists.

Time was running out. The BW experiments conducted by the Japanese military under the command of Gen. Ishii had become very sophisticated. Likewise, the information was coming into the American intelligence community. The Japanese even used their prowess in bacteriological warfare as a psychological warfare tool. But in doing so they disclosed what they had already accomplished. They noted on their radio in Singapore, "At the present moment there are Anglo-American forces in India and Burma. They are learning what it is to fall victim to tropical diseases...The British 14th Army is a dead army. Disease and the Japanese forces were responsible for bringing this about."

It was not until after the war that American intelligence learned that Gen. Ishii did all of his more serious research at a camp in northern Manchuria. His organization was called Unit 731. It was here that Gen. Shiro Ishii conducted experiments on human beings. It was work done using those human beings that made Japan the world's leading authority on offensive bacteriological warfare agents as well as defensive bacteriological systems. No other country, Ishii reasoned, would have the technical details on how epidemics spread and how to protect against them. As we shall see, what we did with the knowledge of Japan's activities, as well as the technical data resulting from those experiments, is shocking. But first, we must continue explaining what they did. We must also discuss the experiments conducted here in the United States during the war.

The experimentation was at a place called Harbin starting as early as 1932. At first they used prisoners who had been sentenced to death. Later, they were not so particular. During the war with China, they used Chinese prisoners of war. It was repeatedly reported by the Japanese that American prisoners of war were also used. White Russians, caught in the area with Japan's war with the China were also used, according to an interrogated Japanese army officer.

Each prisoner was placed in a closely guarded cell where the experiments were conducted. After each prisoner died, they were cremated in an electric furnace to remove all evidence that it had happened. Starting in 1935, motion pictures of the experiments were taken and these were shown to senior army staff officers. It was reported that 3,000 were sacrificed at a separate test site called Pingfan. Why was it required to use so many humans?

The Japanese learned that epidemics occurred naturally but attempts to create them artificially are more difficult. Means must be found to find the most efficient method of transmittal. Many experiments were needed to find the lethal doses required to spread the agent. What would work with animals would not necessarily work with humans. Also, they needed to find out the best way to immunize and only humans could be used for this purpose.

General Ishii knew that the West's moral codes (at least this was his impression) would not allow for such experimentation and that alone would put Japan on the leading edge in these experiments. They could use only healthy humans so extensive medical tests were conducted on (prospective) prisoners. Gen. Ishii and his technical staff did not even consider these prisoners to be human beings.

Diseases would be forcibly injected or they would be administered with a special stick-shaped gun. They were sometimes infected through the food or drink. But there was no escape. Cholera, anthrax, TB, typhoid, rickettsia and dysentery were just some of the bacteria used to test and to modify to make more deadly.

The military surgeons seemed to be totally oblivious to the grisly task they were performing when they conducted dissections of the dead victims to determine the effects. The civilian doctors assigned to the unit did not have the crassness to do that type of work. Apparently, the military had conducted a psychological profile and psychological programming on these military personnel. This, in itself, is a lesson for us to learn in today's society.

They did studies on the effects of frostbite. They would place prisoners, well lashed into position, outside in subfreezing weather after first inserting their arms and legs in water. The dry, cold air would be more effective that way. Actual photographs of the results of the tests showed nothing but blackened bones, which were once hands and feet. The victims were still alive.

The purpose of these experiments was to determine the best way to treat frostbite conditions for soldiers in combat. We have read in open literature that it was the Germans who had discovered that inserting frostbitten limbs in lukewarm water, around 100 Fahrenheit but never as high as 120 degrees was successful. That was misinformation. It was the Japanese who developed that information based on studies done on live human prisoners.

They did studies on chemical warfare agents, also. Again, they used live human prisoners to accomplish the experiments. They tested mustard gas, hydrogen cyanide, acetone cyanide, and potassium cyanide. Hydrogen cyanide was given extensive study because of its potential for ease of delivery into water supplies.

They did studies on live human victims to observe the progress of various diseases and chemicals. They would actually open up a victim while he was still alive. This seems too bizarre to be true but it is. Why are we discussing this at all? It is because of what happened during the War Crimes Trials in Japan following the war and the "sweetheart" deals made between Japan and the United States during those trials.

Did General Ishii really know the morals of the American authorities before and during the war? Hardly. Our government, too, tested the effects of various diseases on humans. They also tested chemical warfare agents on humans. Only it wasn't on prisoners. It was on the population at large and on military personnel.

One spring morning in 1945, out of the mist along the California coast, a group of U.S. Naval vessels gathered at a selected point off the coast. From one of the ships, they opened the valves of a huge pressure tank and influenza virus was allowed to drift in the breeze toward the shore of California. The population in California was observed over the next few weeks to determine if that system of delivery would cause an epidemic.

This writer has personally talked with soldiers who had been directed into enclosed chambers where chemical warfare agents of different types, including mustard gas and nerve gas, were administered. Following the tests, the soldiers were informed that if they ever talked about these tests to anyone they would be put in federal prison. Through the years since World War II the government has denied that the tests were ever conducted (when compensation has been sought for disabilities received).

Botulinus is a germ that attacks the central nervous system. Paralysis is followed by rapid death. It was known that Japan had developed techniques for efficient delivery of that germ, also. In a very hurried effort, Botulinus germs were multiplied in vast quantities at Fort Detrick and then also hurriedly developed was a vaccine from those live germs and all military personnel involved in the invasion of Europe were given injections. This was done without the military personnel having knowledge of the contents. God only knows what was in all of those massive number of injections we all received during that time period.

That same thing was done during the recent Iraqi police action. However, from the reports being received, many of the service personnel have returned home with a strange sickness that is being attributed to the Anthrax vaccine that was administered. Again, the government appears to be denying responsibility.

The likewise deadly encephalitis disease was purposefully allowed to escape into the air at the Nevada Skull Valley test site. A large number of sheep were killed on land being inhabited by American civilians outside the test site boundry. It is not reported how many humans suffered a like fate from the tests.

During World War II, the army had assigned one man, Lt. Col. Murray Sanders, a medical doctor, the responsibility to investigate and analyze the capabilities of the Japanese in bacteriological warfare. Dr. Sanders was extremely well qualified in bacteriology. Further, he was a very patriotic American and his dicipline to carry out orders was without question. As we shall see, the "good" guys don't always win!

Murray Sanders was knowledgeable of the experiments being conducted at Fort Detrick during the war and many of the tests were developed as a result of the information he had discovered about the efforts of the Japanese. In many of the tests he personally conducted the experiments.

He learned that if the Japanese had wanted to destroy agricultural areas for fifty years, they would have used the anthrax germ. If they had wanted to destroy a large city, they would have inserted a plague germ into the water system. It was discovered that the best way to do that was to use a reverse-flow system by creating a vacuum and drawing the plague into the water pipes. They tried it in New York City in one of the older districts. Sanders entered an apartment house with a small suitcase containing a specially designed screw-topped bottle in which was a pink colored simulator substance. The bottle had a vacuum source and he simply caused the substance to be drawn into the pipes. Had it truly been the plague, New York City would have been devastated. This capability is important to know because of what happened recently in Milwaukee last spring. Another incident in December in Washington, D.C. is of curious origin.

This type of activity has always been a part of warfare where both sides of a conflict do things that, under normal circumstances, would not be acceptable. We in the United States sometimes live under the illusion that under no circumstances would our government do anything immoral. That is simply not true.

Most western nations, however, treat their own citizens in a different manner than that afforded to foreigners. Our United States history books record many instances where our government, through the State Department and using the U.S. Marines, have rescued U.S. citizens from mistreatment by foreign governments. It has been a heritage of this Christian country that the sanctity of life among our citizens is a primary concern of our form of government. That has changed and this history lesson is showing but one example of that change.

Men, whose love of country is impeccable, sometimes do things that are contrary to the principles of this country. Their zeal for this country gets in the way of their love for God and His Commandments.

During the summer of 1945, the war was coming to a close. The war in Europe was finished. An attack on the Japanese islands was in preparation but the Atomic bombs ended that. General Douglas McArthur was assigned the responsibility of the surrender of the Japanese and to continue as the supreme commander of the occupation forces.

Col. Murray Sanders was assigned to General McArthur, along with General Charles Willoughby (chief of Intelligence) and Karl T. Compton (chief of Scientific Intelligence). General McArthur specifically called for these men to continue the work of investigating the Japanese bacteriological warfare expertise.

Let's review the scenario. Germany had surrendered and the preparations for the Nuremberg trials were under way. The United States was the prime mover in developing the agenda for those "war crimes" and two new charges were added to the "conventional war crimes" list. Again, those were "crimes against peace and crimes against humanity." The "crimes against humanity" are of special interest because those are defined as "inhumane acts committed against any civilian population, before or during the war."

Continuing with the scenario, the war crimes trials against Japan were also being developed. The Legal Section of the U.S. government had already obtained knowledge that showed the use of prisoners of war, including Americans, in the Japanese BW program. They tried several times to get more information from the legal staff working for General McArthur regarding the use of humans in the Japanese experiments. McArthur's staff in Japan continued to be less than truthful. The reasoning was that if the U.S. Army's investigations in Japan were given to the Legal Section in Washington, the Russians would then know the secrets. This sounds very logical on the surface but there is more.

The State-War-Navy (Departments) Coordinating Committee (SWNCC) was organized to coordinate the war crimes trials in Japan. Although Col. Sanders had only begun the investigations, the SWNCC already knew enough about Japan's program to warrant bringing to trial the Japanese officials involved.

But the intelligence community was determined not to bring them to trial for war crimes. In a report prepared by the SWNCC, the following extraordinary statements were made:

"Experiments on human beings similar to those conducted by the Ishii Group have been condemned as war crimes by the International Military Tribunal for the trial of major Nazi war criminals in its decision handed down at Nuremberg on September 30, 1946. This Government is at present prosecuting leading German scientists and medical doctors at Nuremberg for offenses which included experiments on human beings which resulted in the suffering and death of most of those experimented on."

"Data already obtained from Ishii and his colleagues have proven to be of great value in confirming, supplementing and complementing several phases of U.S. research in BW, and may suggest new fields for future research. This Japanese information is the only known source of data from scientifically controlled experiments showing the direct effect of BW agents on man. In the past it has been necessary to evaluate the effects of BW agents on man from data through animal experimentation. Such evaluation is inconclusive and far less complete than results obtained from certain types of human experimentation."

"It is felt that the use of this information as a basis for war crimes evidence would be a grave detriment to Japanese cooperation with the United States occupation forces in Japan. For all practical purposes an agreement with Ishii and his associates that information given by them on the Japanese BW program will be retained in intelligence channels is equivalent to an agreement that this Government will not prosecute any of those involved in BW activities in which war crimes were committed. Such an understanding would be of great value to the security of the American people because of the information which Ishii and his associates have already furnished and will continue to furnish."

Here was their astounding conclusion: "The value to the US of Japanese BW data is of such importance to national security as to far outweigh the value accruing from 'war crimes' prosecution. In the interests of national security it would not be advisable to make this information available to other nations as would be the case in the event of a 'war crimes' trial of Japanese BW experts. The BW information obtained from Japanese sources should be retained in intelligence channels and should not be employed as 'war crimes' evidence."

Even the State Department's representative on the SWNCC disagreed with the official position of the committee. However, it was decided not to allow a "minority report" to be written on the matter.

Then there was one more communication between Washington and McArthur's headquarters in Japan that is very revealing. It is only one word that is important for us to understand. That communication read, in part: "...we have been exploring the possibilities of obtaining some solution of the problem...However, the feeling of several staff groups in Washington, including G-2, is that this problem is more or less a 'FAMILY' (emphasis mine-ed.) affair in the Far Eastern Command." End of quotes. The word "family" is of vital importance if we are to understand what has transpired in and with Japan since the war.

There has to be a reason other than national security why these Japanese officers and scientists were excused from war crimes trials. Why was it so important to keep the secrets of BW that Japan developed using human victims contained within a very tight knit group? What "family" are we talking about? Why hasn't the news media picked up on this and started extensive investigations? Why was it necessary for foreign TV investigators and reporters to study this phenomena and to write a book on the subject? Such a book has been written, titled Unit 731, written by Peter Williams and David Wallace, published by Free Press, New York, price $27.95. The information contained in that book is worth every penny of the price. Most all of this information can be found in that book.

So the war crimes trials were conducted in Japan following the war without any mention of bacteriological warfare or chemical warfare having been conducted. There were no indictments against those who had perpetrated these activities, including the use of humans as test specimens. It was the American government, with support from the British government, which forced that determination on all of the Allied governments involved. It was determined that the Japanese Emperor would also be exempt from being tried as a war criminal. At Potsdam the Allies determined that Japan was not to be enslaved as a race or destroyed as a nation. This, too, was much different from their determination to destroy Germany.

There is more to this history lesson! Col. Murray Sanders spent only about ten weeks in Japan doing the investigative work for General McArthur. In that period of time though, he was able to obtain enough information to know that the Japanese had truly become the world's leading experts on bacteriological warfare. And they did it by using humans as their test subjects.

Col. Sanders was ordered back to the United States to brief the scientists at Fort Detrick. But he was there for only a very short time. He became ill with tuberculosis! He spent the next two years in bed. During that two year period, he had a lot of time to think about what had taken place during his investigations. He came to the realization that he had been "used" by his superiors, from McArthur to those in command in the Intelligence community. He was determined to clear his name.

Of all the men he was associated with during this "sweetheart deal" with the Japanese, Col. Sanders was the only outsider. He was a medical doctor first and foremost. He certainly did not understand the concept of the "family." Was his tuberculosis acquired naturally or was it administered? We will never know. But to add further questions in this regard, the man who was sent to replace Sanders, another expert named Arvo Thompson committed suicide following his work for the Far Eastern Command and the scientists at Fort Detrick. As we all by now should realize, "suicide" has become an art form to silence the politically incorrect outsider.

What happened to all of the Japanese officers and scientists following the war? Were they allowed to continue with their technical training in the bacteriological, medical and chemical fields? It was determined that the military officers would be retired on sizable pensions but would not be allowed to continue working in the same fields. The civilian scientists continued in their work by working with some of the largest chemical and medical companies in Japan. Some became presidents and professors at the leading universities in Japan where they could teach the technical lessons they learned during the war. These men became a part of the industrial complex of Japan which has been so successful in competing with the West for international trade under the protection of the Trilateral Commission, etc.

In Japan, many scientists who have become colleagues of these former war-time bacteriological warfare specialists, state that these men have no shame. They state that their work in the Manchurian test labs during the war had nothing to do with patriotism. It became a sort of elitism which continued to grow and that appears to have continued following the war.

What happened to the living American and British prisoners-of-war who had been used as guinea pigs? They were "stone-walled" by their governments with the simple statements that there are no records of such incidents or that it didn't happen.

There were 1485 men from America, England, Australia and New Zealand who were selected to be human guinea pigs at Mukden. They were selected because they were in good health at the time.

Warren (Pappy) Whelchel, of the NM 200th Coast Artillery was in Mukden but was not selected to enter into those chambers where no one returned. After the war, he was sent to the Brun Hospital in Santa Fe, NM. He was so ill he couldn't walk. His outward symptoms were those of beri beri. Trying to get compensation for many years following the war he was stonewalled with "Americans don't have beri beri, pellagra or scurvy. You must be mistaken." They didn't believe what he told them. Pappy Whelchel died in September, 1983, not having found justice.

Another Mukden veteran, Greg Rodriguez, is another example. Rodriguez even met Dr. Murray Sanders after the war. Rodriguez had this to say about his meeting with Sanders, "Like Diogenes, I have searched the world for an honest man. I believe in Dr. Sanders; he has taken risks with his own reputation in order to speak the truth about Unit 731 and the conspiracy to cover up those war crimes committed by Ishii and his men. From 1941 on, we Americans have been victims of a series of lies. The truth can now be seen by those who seek it."

Not all men in government obediently kept quiet about this secret of secrets. Congressman Pat Williams of Montana initiated a Congressional inquiry. He submitted this evidence, "I am submitting the records for Felix Kozakevitch, an American soldier from New York who was imprisoned at one of those experimentation camps. Apart from severe beatings, Kozakevitch was subjected to frostbite experiments, forced to stand at attention in deep snow in sub-zero temperatures. Felix Kozakevitch never received compensation, never received needed counseling, adequate health care. The country for which he fought, denied his terrible experience. Mr. Kozakevitch died a year ago." (written in 1986.)

Congressman Williams stated at the hearings, "These men are victims of a terrible secret, born forty-four years ago deep in Manchuria in Japanese prisoner camps. Theirs perhaps has been the best-kept secret of World War II, long denied by Japan and long concealed by the United States government."

Did those Congressional Hearings change anything? Hardly. The same "elitism" that the younger Japanese scientists view in the group of bacteriological warfare experts who now have positions of leadership in Japan, exists here and in Britain. We see it in the Trilateral Commission, the Bilderbergers, the CFR and the Club of Rome. There is no change. In reality, it has now grown to an unbelievable monster, which is enslaving us.

What about the "family?" It exists and is flourishing. Strangely, one does not have to be of "nobility" to be a member. Oliver North is not of nobility. Louis Guifrida, the man who organized the first SWAT teams and started FEMA is not of nobility. Many analysts indicate that Oliver North helped write the FEMA programs with Guifrida. President Clinton is a member and he certainly is not nobility!

The zeal that the "family" has for their activity cannot be fully understood until we understand their driving force. The "family," in some strange way, believe they are fulfilling, Biblical prophesies. The strange part is that not all of the people associated with the group can be considered religious, including Christian. But the driving force is that of extreme Christian Fundamentalism. That fundamentalism is mainly directed toward the forcing of the battle of Armageddon upon the world (Ezek. 38-39 and Rev. 20). Incidentally, General Ishii, the head of the Japanese bacteriological warfare program, was baptized and became a Christian following World War II!

The "family" has taken on different code names for its respective groups. One is "True Believers" which was used by Oliver North had that code name in his note books. Another is simply the word "Believers." Another is "The Chosen Ones." It was revealed in some of the Senate and House Committee Hearings during the Iran-Contra affair that they have come to believe that the work they are doing is being done in a religious context.

The link between religious fundamentalism of all types and the development of bacteriological warfare agents can now be understood. In the November-December, 1993 issue of the Intelligence Newsletter, we discussed the Club of Rome's Project 2000 in which the need to reduce the population of the earth is of prime importance to the "family." The use of "Designer Viruses" is undoubtedly the most efficient way to reduce that population.

The evil is beyond comprehension. On one hand, the starving populations of the world are being fed by the Western world and medical teams are sent in to give them better health. Once their health is a little better and they are no longer starving, their birth rate explodes! Then, the concern is to reduce the population "by any means necessary." This includes the new strains of tuberculosis which currently are nearly impossible to eradicate, new strains of malaria, new strains of cholera, new strains of anthrax and some researchers say the HIV which causes AIDS. A new diarrhea microbe has been found that is a form of the protozoa coccidian genus cyclospora. It has never been found in humans before. They are now taking the common E. Coli bacteria and modifying it with DNA manipulations.

Let us return to the outbreak of a rare bacterium, cryptosporidium, in the water supply in Milwaukee. Forty deaths were caused by this disease. The government blamed it on "animal waste runoff from upstream." Did someone take their little bottles with vacuum attachments to force it into the water supply? It is highly suspected by some analysts that this is exactly what happened.

The current outbreaks of these various designer diseases are for practice. They are an excellent opportunity to discover vaccines. What are the long range plans of the "family?" From many sources in the fields of political scientists, investigative reporters and Christian Bible students, there seems to be a common evaluation. The use of bacteriological warfare against civilian populations will escalate. The only thing holding back a massive operation is the development of proven vaccines to protect those chosen to survive. The evil deed could then be accomplished. Be assured that it won't be the "family" who will be blamed!

Read Psalm 91 over and over. It gives us strength and courage. "Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night; nor for the arrow that flieth by day; Nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness; nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday. A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee. There shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling." (Psa 91:5-7,10)
