

Hindu Kush

Editorial by Jamie Toth

The Hindu Kush from 54 Green Acres Farm is a potent indica dominant hybrid; the dried flower has a pale green hue with copper-colored hairs, and it smells of pine sap and golden peppercorns. The densely packed bud is soggy with trichomes and mucks up in our grinder, which is the sign of a flower with strong sedative effects. This strain does not disappoint, which is why we've been cultivating Hindu Kush at 54 Green Acres since they first since 2016.

When you dry herb vaporize Hindu Kush, even in the lower temperatures (up to 388 or so), the vaporizer brings out a smooth sandalwood and jasmine taste. There are some faint suggestions of pine and roses, with no harsh or oily aftertaste. Above 390, Hindu Kush transforms into a stickier vapor that coats the mouthpiece with a silky incense of mango and green tea.

Above 420°F, the smoldering trichomes start to take over and mellow sandalwood darkens into a rich hickory taste. The slick vapor becomes more intense and tactile. Heating at this temperature soon brings a smokiness to the vapor, which can be pleasant for those who like heavier hits but could be overbearing for some. If coughing or breathing issues are a problem, I would recommend keeping Hindu Kush at lower temperatures for longer sessions.

However, for those looking for a rich, flavorful smoke to pack into a water pipe or a 'jazz cigarette', Hindu Kush is strongly recommended. Hindu Kush's luxurious, satisfying smoke is reminiscent of fine tobacco and brown liquor, the perfect smoke to pacify the worried soul.

The most distinctive characteristic of this strain is its potency. At 25.40% THC, this Hindu Kush sits heavy onto the eyelids while propping up a wry grin on the face. Its effects are immediate and stony, making it difficult to think clearly. Thoughts are slowed and short term memory is greatly disabled. Hindu Kush is great for a weekend or for winding down after a stressful day. It doesn't take long for the effects to take hold: a dazzling physical sensation distracts any attempt at focusing on much of anything. The relaxing, sedative effects come with a bit of an increased appetite.

We've been cultivating Hindu Kush at 54 Green Acres since 2016. We have a commitment at 54 Green Acres to growing all of our crops organically and have been a Certified Kind grower for 5 years. This certification demonstrates our ongoing commitment to organic, living soil practices that examine not only our growing methods but our supply chain as well. Certified Kind farms are Kind to Earth and Kind to Life.

We're so delighted with our phenotype of Hindu Kush that she is one of the three strains featured in our special 54honey offering. Our 54honey pairs our raw blackberry honey with terpenes and distillate from a strain. We have three different strains featured, and their terpenes and distillate mix with the honey to create complex flavors and a mind-body buzz that is similar to that of our flower.

All of our cannabis is sungrown on our Southern Oregon organic farm. It's watered from Sucker Creek, a tributary of the Illinois River. The property has had water rights attached since 1882. In addition to watering our fine cannabis, the creek also helps sustain the humans, rabbits, apples, lettuce, and other crops at here 54 Green Acres.
