STOP BY FOR CHRISTMAS AT THE FARMHOUSE ON DECEMBER 14TH

The Norwell Historical Society will host its annual "Christmas at the Farmhouse" event at the Jacobs Homestead on the corner of Jacobs

Lane and Main Street on December 14, 2014. Everyone is invited to come and tour the house, which will be decorated for the holidays. Hot cider and victuals will be available to all who visit. No RSVP is necessary—just drop in for a tour and a treat.

Visit www.norwellhistoricalsociety.org (and click on the "Events" tab) for more information. If you are interested in baking a homemade treat for this event, please call 781-659-1888 or contact the Society via the website.

Unfortunately, the Jacobs Farmhouse is not handicapped accessible and if the weather is inclement, the event will not take place. Check the website or telephone the Society for up-to-date information.

AUTHOR JOHN CHEEVER & THE NORWELL CONNECTION

by Sam Olson

The front page of the June 23, 1982 edition of the Boston Globe featured an article on funeral services for John Cheever topped by a photo of his flag-draped casket being borne down the steps of Norwell's First Parish Church followed by family and friends. A hearse from Sparrell's Funeral Home, now McNamara-Sparrell, drove the few hundred feet to the burial site just behind the white-fenced eighteenth century burial ground adjacent to the parking lot where McGreal's Tavern is now located.

The Globe described Norwell Center on that beautiful June day--the classic 1830 church, the sound of flowing water from the town spring, the glimpse of the North River through the leaves dappled by the early summer sunshine. No Chamber of Commerce "puff" could have put our small community in a better light.

Over the succeeding years, many citizens have pondered why our community became the final resting place for Cheever, "the Chekof of the suburbs," so closely connected to the upscale towns of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut. After delving into several sources describing the circumstances of Cheever's often tortured life, I found that there were many good reasons.

John William Cheever was born in 1912 in Quincy, Mass., to a family that traced its paternal branch to a passenger on John Winthrop's flagship the Arbella. An idyllic childhood in the upper middle class suburb of Wollaston came to a halt when his classically-educated father, Frederick Lincoln Cheever, lost most of his assets when the shoe industry collapsed in the mid-twenties. Further losses followed in the stock market crash of 1929. In 1933, the mortgage on the imposing eleven-room house was foreclosed.

A more fortunate childhood playmate of Cheever was Rollin Bailey whose father was a Quincy banker. Rollin, who died in 2007, and his wife Ruth Chipman Bailey were longtime Parker Street residents. Rollin is remembered for voluntarily videotaping Norwell Selectmen meetings. He and Ruth were for many years mainstays of the North River Players, both on and offstage. Rollin was interviewed several times by Cheever biographer Scott Donaldson. Cheever was convinced he was never again invited to play on the Bailey tennis courts after what he perceived as his family's disgrace. Bailey recalled seeing his childhood friend for the last time on a troop train during World War II. He described Cheever's manner at their chance meeting as far from cordial.

Friends admired Mary Lily Cheever's maintaining the family by opening a gift shop on Hancock Street in Quincy. John, however, always believed she demeaned the family name by becoming a shopkeeper. Although not mentioned in sources used, I came across a notice in the Rockland Standard of July 2, 1933, about the Mary Cheever Shoppe opening on Washington Street, Norwell, in the John Simmons place.

Still another connection was Cheever's passing through the town to visit his grandmother's farm in Hanover where Mary Cheever and her mother operated a tearoom for a time. Cheever loved the sights, sounds, and smells of the picturesque river and the surrounding marshes.

An important Norwell experience later on was visiting his older brother Fred, his wife Iris, and their three children in their Alpine-style chalet built amidst a grove of pine trees on River Street.

Yet another South Shore link was his attendance at Thayer Academy in Braintree. Although the official reason for John's expulsion was his failure to meet academic requirements, he claimed it was for smoking. Regardless, his first notice as a promising writer came with the publication of the short story "Expelled" in the New Republic in 1930.

Cheever never attended college, or, for that matter, graduated high school. The thirties was a tough time for an aspiring writer to make a living. In addition, lapses into depression, a growing dependence on alcohol, doubts about his creativity, and a self-loathing about his bisexuality were among the demons he faced. He did gain employment for a time writing travel guides for the WPA's Writers Workshop. He considered the whole program a giant "boondoggle."

In 1941, he married Mary Winterhitz who survived her husband for many years, dying herself in 2014. She was the daughter of Dr. Milton Winternitz, Chief of Surgery at Yale University Medical Center. She was also the granddaughter of Thomas Watson of Braintree, receiver of the first telephone message from Alexander Graham Bell. Three children were born to the couple, two of whom became writers. Although the union was often fraught with difficulties, Susan Cheever in her biography of her father, Home Before Dark, felt the marriage survived for three reasons: the children, a genuine love for one another, or simply just out of habit.

After stateside army service in World War II, Cheever's writing fortunes picked up. He had a long time arrangement with The New Yorker for short story contributions. Among the best known of his stories was "The Swimmer," which was made into a movie starring Burt Lancaster. While the film was being made, Cheever began an affair with the producer's wife, actress Hope Lange.

His growing success enabled him to purchase a stone-gabled Dutch Colonial overlooking the Hudson River in Ossining, New York. Although he went on to achieve all the important American literary awards including the 1979 Pulitzer Prize for fiction for The Short Stories of John Cheever, he was able to publish only four novels. The first of these was The Wapshot Chronicle which took him ten years to write. His most successful, The Falconer, was written toward the end of his life. He continued to be nagged with the feeling that writing short stories wasn't as prestigious as writing novels.

In 1975, Cheever was teaching a course on short story writing at Boston University. While living in an apartment on Bay State Road, it was becoming apparent to associates that he was drinking himself to death.

Ironically it was his brother Fred, himself a recovering alcoholic, who was in part responsible for John's salvation. Fred took him out of Boston, driving him back to Ossining where Mary had him committed to Smithers Institution, a facility treating chronic alcoholism. Cheever never took another drink. Unfortunately, in 1981, he was diagnosed with renal cancer which soon metastasized. Death came on June 18, 1982.

Cheever had never expressed any interest in where he might be interred but often spoke of the family's "burying hole" in Norwell's First Parish Cemetery. Both his mother and father had been buried there when they died in the mid-forties. Brother Fred had also attended First Parish Church for many years. Virtually broke, Fred had spent the last months of his life at Wheeler Park, a public housing facility for seniors in Scituate.

Fred's daughter, Jane Cheever Carr, now a resident of Hingham, checked with the Sparrell Funeral Home which confirmed that there was a burial plot next to his parents. The family thus decided that he would be buried here.

Cheever's widow and children asked John Updike to deliver the eulogy. Updike, then and now, is often considered the best American novelist of the mid and late twentieth century. Despite rumors to the contrary, there was no basis to believe the two writers were jealous rivals.

There were only forty mourners present as there was to be another service in Ossining the following day.

The church was packed with photographers. Loring "Spike" Wadsworth, described by one source as the quintessential canny New England undertaker, is credited with maintaining the dignity of the occasion by limiting the number of photographers admitted to the balcony.

First Parish Cemetery's caretaker recently told me that visitors asked to see the Cheever grave more than any other. The graves of father, mother and son are marked by three black stone cathedral window-shaped monuments.

A lighter touch to the day of the funeral has been supplied by John Hersey, author of Hiroshima. As Cheever's casket was being lowered into the ground, he noticed three frolicking boys on a pathway on a hillside above the grave. One of the boys suddenly tossed off three perfect cartwheels. Hersey said his good friend would have really liked that!
