Two bills aim to give mobile home park tenants more rights in Colorado

After passing a new law last legislative session to add enforcement measures to the Mobile Home Park Act, this year, state lawmakers have introduced two bills to give the more than 100,000 tenants who live in manufactured homes more rights. The first bill, House Bill 20-1201, gives mobile home park tenants the right to buy the park if the owner decides to sell. Under the legislation, when a READ MORE

Five Points sits at the crossroads of prosperity, preservation

From the jazz clubs on Friday evening to the church pews on Sunday morning and all the soul food you could eat in between, Denver's Five Points neighborhood represented the heart and the hub of the city's black community for more than half the 20th century. In the new millennium, the place where five streets meet is viewed by some community and city political leaders as a dead-end on READ MORE

Northern Colorado residents worried about water pipeline

In the 1980s, Thornton, like many forward-thinking Colorado municipalities, began looking for a way to secure itself adequate water access for its growing populace. The city's answer was a substantial share in a ditch that comes off a spot on the Cache la Poudre River northwest of Fort Collins and snakes into northern Weld near Pierce. Thornton also bought dozens of farms in that region, and their water rights with them. "It's very high-quality water," said Mark Koleber, director of the Thornton Water Project, pointing out the location of the ditch's diversion from the Poudre on a map. Pointing to a very nearby spot on the same map, Koleber continued: "Right there is where Greeley gets its water. And we're there. So we wanted that water supply and so we bought into this ditch company. The way you do that is buy shares in the ditch company. If you buy shares, you have a piece of what they own. At that time we acquired about 47% of this company, and along with it we bought about 20,000 acres of farmland."
