Sacred Vessels (Part One)

Among the requisites for the celebration of Mass, the sacred vessels are held in special honor, especially the chalice and paten, in which the bread and wine are offered and consecrated, and from which the Body and Blood of the Lord are consumed. Therefore, they must be made in strict conformity with the norms of tradition and of the liturgical books.

The norms governing in general the dignity and artistic worth of sacred objects and their appropriateness for sacred use are to be applied also to sacred vessels.

In the dioceses of the United States of America, it has been lawfully established that sacred vessels are to be made from precious metal, with the proviso that if they are made from metal that rusts or from a metal less precious than gold, then ordinarily they should be gilded on the inside. Furthermore, it is laid down that vessels may also be used that are made from other solid materials that, according to the common estimation in each region, are precious; for example, ebony or other hard woods, provided that such materials are suited to sacred use and do not easily break or deteriorate. This applies to all vessels which hold the hosts, such as the paten, the ciborium, the pyx, the monstrance, and other things of this kind.

In fulfilment of the sacred duty laid upon bishops to safeguard the liturgy and the sacraments in their dioceses, and as foreseen by law, the Archbishop of Portland in Oregon restricts the options as they will be applied in the Archdiocese. It is therefore determined that there are no grounds locally for departing from the tradition of using exclusively precious metals, with interior gilding, for the vessels themselves (as distinct from the foot of the chalice, for example, or the decorative elements of a monstrance), or for disregarding the traditional forms for the chalice and for all the different vessels that contain the sacred hosts. Nor are sacred vessels to be of poor quality or lacking in adequate style. Cases of doubt about such forms should be referred to the Archbishop through the Office of Divine Worship. Situations in conflict with the norms should be remedied forthwith.
