TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1976

17

SPORTS

TELEVISION

Women in politics
- Part II

Avoiding pitfalls on the way up

The opportunity for bright, energetic women to participate in politics has never been better than this year. But discrimination in the arena does exist, regardless of a woman's skills.

In this article, the second of a series, political consultant Jeff Greenfield warns of the pitfalls along the campaign trail, and how to avoid them.

By JEFF GREENFIELD

When I worked for Mayor John Lindsay, city hall was swarming with mayoral assistants: young, bright, brash, aggressive, glib. One of those assistants was a quiet, unassertive woman who was clearly outside the battle for the Mayor's ear. I don't know what happened to most of those bright young aides, but I do know what happened to that quiet young woman. She works in the Congress now. Her name is Elizabeth Holtzman.

Perhaps because of her city hall scars, for a militantly liberal Congressman more than a decade ago, says that "the first fight I had to make was over money.

"When I asked for the same salary as the man he'd fired, the Congressman said, 'Why do you want so much? You're single.' I heard other women being asked, 'Why do you need worker Carol Opton, "is the key. There may be times when you'll have to make coffee, and you can grit your teeth once or twice on that fight. But you must stick to your guns on salary."

The same is true of the other unfair practices in politics. Talking about her early professional staff more heavily female than most in Congres. Legislative assistant Aviva Futurian says that "having a woman employer is incredibly different from the usual experience on Capitol Hill. Liz has fantastic respect, even among the young, smart lawyers from the Senate who think of themselves as the 'real' Senators. When I tell them who I work for, there's a lot less condescension. And of course, with Liz, there's no question of my getting less responsibility because I'm a woman."

Working for a woman is one way to cut through the barriers of discrimination in politics. It also helps to have "traditional" credentials. Jane Frank, who is chief counsel to Sen. John Tunney's Committee on Constitutional Rights, joined Tunney's staff as a Harvard Law School graduate with three years of private practice, and says there were "no hassles at all. Oh, I guess I was mistaken for a secretary once or twice, but that was really all."

Those women without female candidates or Harvard Law degrees have it a lot rougher in the competitive, often male-dominated, battlefield ambience of political campaigns. They have always been welcome, of course; as volunteers, as low-salaried, low-visibility workers who put the schedules and meetings together while their male bosses are out lunching with the members of the press. But when they seek something closer to equity, they find themselves met with a series of barriers.

BOTH POLITICAL PARTIES discriminate more than government itself — far more," says Rep. Margaret Heckler from Massachusetts. "As a volunteer campaign worker, I remember a whole team of women taking all the abuse that one receives, such as at a railway station with commuters, only to find the candidate at home with his feet up, sipping a cocktail."

One woman (whose name will be changed to Susan, to protect the guilty) remembers being in a high-level campaign meeting at which her presence was necessary but clearly unwelcome.

"The press secretary sent out for Cokes," Susan says. "It was a very hot and muggy night. There were six of us in the room, and he came back in with five Cokes. I will never forget that small, petty way of telling me I didn't really belong."

There are similar slights aimed at women. Campaigns are always high-voltage affairs, and people lose their tempers with clockwork regularity. When a woman blows up, it is taken as proof of "feminine instability" or, it is said knowingly, "it's her time of the month." Women are constantly "offered" jobs with less status than men, and it is explained to them that, while of course they will have the responsibility, it wouldn't do to give them the title because of sensitivity.

BUT BY FAR the most common form of anti-female discrimination is the most basic: money. It crosses party and political lines completely; some of the most "liberal" politicians are the worst proponents of inequality. Angela Cohen, who event to work so much? Your husband works.' Many offices in Congress had women being paid as secretaries who were doing exactly the same work as men, but who could just not get paid the same as a man."

When Carol Welch quit her secure government job to join Robert Kennedy's 1968 presidential campaign, she was promised $300 a week. When she drew her first pay check, she found she was making $100 a week, because "women in this campaign are being paid $100 a week."

Welch won her fight by demanding that she be paid what she'd been promised. And this is the simple but necessary tactic that has to be kept in mind. Once a campaign makes a commitment, they can't be allowed to skip it on the ground that "women don't need as much as men."

THERE ARE LOTS of times when campaigns don't pay anybody; when the staff finds it has "volunteered" its paychecks away in the last weeks of frenetic fund-raising. That's part of the risk any worker takes. But the days of the double-standard — at least as far as salaries are concerned — are over.

Most candidates simply cannot stand the publicity that would erupt if the press found out their campaigns were giving one level of pay to men and another to women. And most political reporters are smart enough to tell the difference between a disgruntled campaign worker and a legitimate case of sex discrimination.

"Salary," says veteran New York political days in politics, Rep. Millicent Fenwick from New Jersey says, "Women are on the outside when the door to the smoke-filled room is closed." But when a woman has spent four days gathering information for a political briefing, there's nothing right about her being excluded from the briefing session with a candidate. Here, too, firmness is important.

ONE RESEARCHER I once worked with, "Betsy Forester," got herself included by knowing more than anybody else.

"It was important that the candidate be constantly briefed about the issues. Well, they couldn't exclude me from the 'big' meetings because I was in charge of the research files — nobody else knew what was in them. They had to have me there, even though they didn't want me."

In this respect, the women's movement has helped make political participation by women more "acceptable" by making many of the traits of successful campaign operatives — aggressiveness, firmness, insistence on fairness — less "irresponsible" than it once seemed. When a political operative who's proven her worth demands the salary, the title and the access that goes with that worth, it is less easy to dismiss her demands than it once was.

Nonetheless, the biggest obstacle to equality in politics is still the handiest tool of prejudice: the innuendo.

Copyright (c) 1976 Field Enterprises, Inc. (Tomorrow: Political pillow talk)

Social Security bias case newest to go before court

WASHINGTON (UPI) — The Supreme Court accepted another sex discrimination case yesterday, agreeing to decide if men are entitled to the same Social Security benefits as women.

The government claims this change could put the already troubled system into even more serious financial straits.

The justices probably will hear arguments next fall. The case is one of six now pending on the sexual equality issue.

IN A FLURRY of activity following a month-long recess, the justices also let stand a lower court ruling which uphreld the system for selecting delegates to the Republican National Convention.

It also agreed to review whether it is constitutional for states to require physicians and druggists to file with the state the names and addresses of persons being treated with certain types of prescription pain killers such as codeine and morphine.

And it agreed to review standards for obtaining evidence against criminal suspects through wiretaps.

But the court refused to become involved with comedian Steve Allen's Polish jokes which Polish-Americans took seriously. It refused to review a U.S. Court of Appeals ruling that Polish-Americans offended by ethnic jokes do not have a right to free broadcast time to defend their national heritage.

THE SOCIAL SECURITY suit accepted for review was brought by Leon Goldfarb of Brooklyn.

Under the law, a widower or husband of a retired woman must prove he relied on his wife for most of his support before he can collect benefits. Women are entitled to benefits without proof of support.

A federal district court struck down the regulations as unconstitutional sex discrimination. The Department of Health, Education and Welfare said that under this ruling, the government would pay out $400 million more each year, imposing "a severe burden on the Social Security trust fund's already strained resources."

On other aspects of sex discrimination, the court already has ruled that the government must pay survivors' insurance to widowers with children on the same basis as to widows, and that it must provide dependency benefits to servicewomen on the same basis as to servicemen.

The high court said women who work cannot be deprived of the same protection for their families accorded men as a result of employment.