The Indiana Immigration Bill, proposed by State Senator Mike Delph, Carmel, is a step forward in immigration reform, its goal being simple: Get the Mexicans out. The legislation is getting the Mexicans out by arresting and deporting any and every person that looks like, sounds like, tastes like, or smells like a Mexican, as well as anyone that has the movie "Selena" in their Netflix Queue.

While Federal Government struggles to reach a satisfactory solution to the Rio Grande Flooding (if you know what I mean), local government is wasting no time, as is evidenced by the Indiana Immigration Bill.

But some citizens are wondering if the new policy of arresting anyone with questionable citizenship status is harming more than it is helping.

The Taco Bell franchise has seen a 400% drop in employment in the Greater Indianapolis area since the legislation's passing.

Steve Frenclin, a 35-year-old investment banker, has felt nothing but negative effects.

"Ever since this stupid legislation passed about arresting all the Mexicans, every single Taco Bell is empty. Every. Single. Taco Bell," Frenclin says, outraged. "Where am I supposed to get my fourth meal when I'm stoned out of my mind at 2 a.m.? Cracker Barrel?"

Frenclin is not alone in his plight. Local fast food restaurants have seen a 98% increase in individuals requesting any kind of meal that "will make me shit my brain out."

Establishments such as Wendy's and Starbucks have found that the best way to meet these customers' needs is to go outside, find animal feces, throw it in a box, melt some cheese on it, and serve it as is, creating a new name with each serving.

Valerie Trint, 16, is a Starbucks barista on the east side of Indianapolis. She said she is running out of animal feces--and names. "My little brother watches 'Dora The Explorer' a lot, so to come up with the name I take something Dora said and then I, like, just add the word nacho," Trint explains. "But, seriously, Taco Bell needs to get back on its game because I'm really sick of people paying for everything in nickels and pennies. I'm like, this is Starbucks, OK?"

U.S. District Court Judge Sarah Evans Barker has said the new immigration law is "seriously flawed," as quoted in an article in The Indianapolis Star. Clearly Barker made this statement immediately following her trip to a desolate Taco Bell last week for lunch, as nothing is more seriously flawed than being denied a Cheesy Crunchy Gordito Extra Cheese Wrap Supreme Nacho Taco Shell Crunchy Cheese Crisp.

Barker's strong words against the legislation led the American Civil Liberties Union of Indiana to host a rally outside the Statehouse, demanding all Taco Bell employees, illegal, underage, or blind, be sent back to work. The ACLU's chants of, "What do we want?", "Diarrhea!", and "when do we want it?", "NOW!", have been heard by state legislators, as the law is now receiving much public discussion.

One unnamed citizen gave a passionate speech, claiming that the Indiana Immigration Bill violates his constitutional rights, echoing Barker's words. "Aren't I an American?," the speaker asked a passionate crowd at the rally. "Don't I have rights? Isn't one of those rights to eat Taco Bell? This is not the America we know and love. Where is our America? WHERE IS OUR AMERICA?!"

Frenclin agrees with the protestors, and hopes that the courts will soon realize how much proud to say I'm American again," Frendlin says. "I'm just pissed that, because some whiny bitch in Carmel had to open his fat mouth, I can't have my Taco Bell." That's right, State Senator Mike Delph. We're looking at you.
