

Making Quality Connections

By Craig B. Toedtman SPHR

As a Job Seeker, you have entered the world of sales - and the sooner you admit that, the better off you'll be. If a role in sales has not been a part of your experience, you could be faced with the challenge of a major paradigm shift. The "sales mentality" is not for everyone – making calls, meeting people, attending meetings and conferences and small group discussions are not easy for some people. And handling rejection? – does one ever get good at that?

That is the world you are now in (or entering). Your product ("YOU") is your number one priority. And, who other than you can sell you best? No one! The successful marketer develops a clear plan and executes with energy and determination.

Once your product ("YOU") is clearly defined and packaged with a good resume and introduction letter, you are ready to begin the process of finding people who could lead you to your next position.

In my role as an executive search consultant, I receive countless requests for assistance. These are unsolicited...and could almost be considered spam, as there is no voice or face to the correspondence. I simply do not know them – but I do know this about them:

1. What they've told me in their resume.
2. They are seeking a new position and want me to do something about it.
3. They don't know the most important thing about how to find a new position.

What is that "most important thing about finding a new position?"

Know the person with whom you are trying to communicate. Give that person a call...use that elevator speech to see if you can get an audience. Write to a person only after you have connected personally.

There are those that think blasting a resume to innumerable sources is an effective means of locating that "right" position for

Summary

Quality Connections -

- o Personalized
- o Not just an email - a conversation
- o You've spoken prior to sending the resume

Making Connections -

- o Use your network; prospect for names
- o Make the calls

7 to 10% of your calls will result in a telephone conversation.

7 to 10% of your telephone conversations will end up with an interview.

It is likely that 7 to 10% of your interviews will end up with an offer.

You do the math!

you. While one could boast about the number of resumes distributed, it is highly questionable that this process will help you land your next position successfully. The personal touch starts with making quality connections – beginning with that often-dreaded cold call.

Cold calls are difficult...and not always immediately productive. A sales person typically lands a conversation 7 to 10% of the time. That means 7 to 10 calls yield 1 conversation...Following this, the sales person turns a conversation into an order 7 to 10 % for each successful conversation, which means 200 calls to make 1 order! To be perfectly blunt, what this could mean for a job seeker is:

- 200 calls – 14 discussions – 1 order (interview)
- 500 calls – 35 discussions – 2 orders (interview)
- 1000 calls – 70 discussions – 5 orders (interview)

200 calls for 1 interview...and the statistics could be similar when converting an interview to a new position. If 7 to 10% of the time is the norm, it could very well take 14 interviews to land one offer. That converts to an amazing number of phone calls, needless to say. These numbers are not presented to discourage you...They are presented to encourage you.

Planning and organizing are critical. The first time I was totally dependent upon my sales ability, I sought my comfort level – finding names...easy...but, calling them...forget it. So, I created a discipline for myself. Mornings are best for me...9 – 11 prime time for my productivity. So, I put on my headset and made my calls between 9 and 11 every day. Every day...Averaging 50 to 100 per day. And, to this day, if my sales are suffering, I can usually attribute it to the fact that my “marketing time” has been sacrificed.

Your job search is all about connections...quality connections – finding names, calling names, and developing relationships with a real person. Don't let the ease of e-mail get in the way of your number one task: making connections...quality connections.

RDC Hiring Edge – your ticket to launch a successful job search that can be implemented quickly and efficiently. Our flexible services provide powerful tools that can be used to quickly create and implement your personal campaign. We invite you to explore our services and pick the package that best suits your needs.

Toedtman.com

Toedtman

Call RDC Hiring Edge now – 267.464.0188 – to invest in the brand called you.