President's Message

Welcome summer ? We have all been waiting for the car show season. However now it is too hot to drive our T Birds much less sit in a car show. I'm sure it will get back to normal soon.

Our June meeting was well attended covered many business items. It was held in a very different location, the Raritan Yacht Club. Thank you Mel and Carmen Ramos for hosting.

We are gearing up for our picnic on August 11, please help where you can. I have secured the insurance and park permit. Arlene Kubat will make sure everything goes smoothly.

Stay safe

Vice President's Message

The weather has been extremely hot. Very unusual for June, but because of global warming this is where we are at!!! It's kind of too hot to sit out with our little birds at car shows or cruise nights. Hope it doesn't stay like this!

Get well - Joan McMillian having to have more chemo, so prayers for her, she is doing great. We all know Joan is a fighter and very strong. Lucille Chabala, feeling better, Don Dubres, was at last meeting, looking good, waiting to see what's next for him. Bob Heissler's significant other, Judy, not doing good, needs our prayers. Dorothy Guidone feeling better. Joan Notar recovery nicely from knee surgery.

I want to thank Mel and Carmen for hosting last months meeting at their Yacht Club. We had a good turnout of members, food very good, the Yacht Club was very nice, just looking out the windows at the sail boats was so beautiful and relaxing. After dinner some of us had dessert on deck just to watch the water and sail boats. Thank you Mel and Carmen.

Donna Jesse sent an email to CTCI President asking questions about different issues going on such as, why is CTCI losing so many members. As of our meeting she has not received any answers.

There really isn't much going on in the next couple of months, except our annual picnic. Paul just sent out a list of foods, drinks, etc. that is still needed. Please get back to me as soon as possible with what you will bring and if you are coming or not coming. Once again phone 973-900-1921 email finallyak@yahoo.com. Please don't ignore, thank you!

Our next meeting will be hosted by Annette & Steve Schmidt, Sunday, July 21st, 1:00 at Franks Pizza, Wycoff. Please let them know if you are attending or not.

Have a Happy and safe 4th of July. See you soon Arlene

From Charles Musto

Whatever happened to the two-door car?

CNN) - During the 1990s, a certain type of American car that had existed for decades became virtually extinct. Big, inefficient, not very practical but strikingly showy and handsome, they still evoke a certain period of over-the-top American style.

These were cars like the Chrysler Cordoba with its "Corinthian leather" seats - roll those Rs like Ricardo Montalban in the ads - the Buick Riviera, the Cadillac Eldorado and the Oldsmobile Toronado. (Spanish-sounding names were big, too.) Driving one of these "personal luxury cars" made a statement about your superior taste and, also, your carefree lifestyle not requiring the mundane practicality of back doors.

There are still two-door cars today, of course, but they're almost all high-performance sports cars not intended for comfortable cruising. But the forty- and fifty-year-old "personal luxury coupes" can command higher prices from car collectors than their four-door peers, evidence of their continued allure.

"I think the term started in the 60s," Brian Rabold with the collector car company Hagerty, said of so-called personal luxury coupes. "But that was the heyday in the 70s. There were still some offerings, but they sort of started to decline in the in the 80s and 90s."

Long, low and stylish, they were the design and technology showpieces for their respective car brands. In 1986, the Riviera offered the first touchscreen in a production car, according to GM. Car companies could do that because these cars sold in lower numbers, even then, than four-door models

Because you had lower volumes you could you could afford to put in higher technology," said Kevin Kirbitz, a former GM engineer who's now head of the company's heritage collection. "You commanded a premium price anyway." Over the years, these cars left their mark. Even today, one of these big two-door American models has a certain allure at a car show. With its long hood, ample chrome and two massive doors allowing awkward access to often reasonably-sized - once you manage to get in there - back seats, they still make a statement

For car designers, two-door models can offer more striking proportions to play with, long hoods that evoke power and tapered, aerodynamic back ends.

"They can get a more raked windshield," said Kirbitz. "They can get that longer proportion that they're looking for."

Many models were offered with either a two- or four-door body. Today, the two-door is generally worth about 67 % more to modern car collectors, attesting to the style's appeal. Of course, someone buying a 50-year-old car is also probably even less concerned with practicality than shoppers were back in the day, Rabold pointed out.

Enter. the Thunderbird

Two-door cars have existed for about as long as cars have had doors but Rabold credits the real upsurge in "personal luxury" styling to the Ford Thunderbird. Introduced in 1955 as somewhat of a competitor to the Chevrolet Corvette. The Thunderbird soon went in a different direction. While the Corvette evolved into a serious sports car, Ford designers added back seats and turned the Thunderbird into a comfortable cruiser. The style quickly caught on.

"That set the stage and then a lot of cars followed on after that," Rabold said. "And so every manufacturer kind of had to have an entry to compete with that segment."

Four-door cars were still more common, but a two-door car said something about you, said Scott Krugger, vice president of design for Stellantis's Dodge division

"As time went on, two-door cars became an individual statement, or a performance statement, or a specialty statement, where the four-door was more of that practicality need, that family need, and they kind of diverged that way," he said.

The run of roomy two-door models lasted a few decades but, by the 1990s, something had changed. Today, it's rare to see a two-door car that isn't a performance model like the Mustang or Corvette. Even the cheapest cars on the market, like the Nissan Versa and Kia Rio, come with four doors. Back doors, even on pickups, are just a default today.

Why did they become extinct?

A number of factors have conspired to push two-door cars to their current niche status. First, the rise of SUVs has pushed cars of all sorts - as in, personal vehicles that are not trucks, vans, or SUVs - to the fringes, regardless of how many doors they have. Today, actual cars make up less than 20 % of all new vehicles, according to data from Cox Automotive. Also, child safety regulations have, no doubt, played a major role, said Kirbitz. By the-1980s, child safety seats were required throughout the United States, so the days of kids clambering over the folded front seats to buckle themselves - or not - into the back seats are over. Today, if you have a two-door car and you have kids, you also have a backache. You've got to lean awkwardly into the back to buckle the youngsters in and, before that, to install the seat itself.

While some two-door cars used to be bargain items - the cheapest entry-level cars were almost always two-door hatchbacks - today two-door models are seen mostly in European luxury cars.

"A car is a representation of yourself and your taste," he said. "And you bring that out more expressively with the coupe, right?"
