

Dodging Satan

My Irish/Italian, sometimes awesome, but mostly creepy, childhood

By Kathleen Zamboni McCormick

Dodging Satan is a hilarious and heartbreaking novel of religious imagery as told by a girl growing up Catholic in New York City in the fifties and sixties. Bridget has an Irish mother and an Italian father. The in-laws hate each other. The mother is prone to throwing entire pies at her husband. Little Bridget sees the snake at Mary's feet not as a symbol of Original Sin, but as a nest of reptiles cloning in her closet. Her dresser drawers are full of snakes. Her mother sprinkles Holy Water everywhere trying to rid the apartment of these invisible pests. That helps, but it's not enough. She's dragged to the priest as well as a psychiatrist. The parents are horrified at what the experts say. From Spiritual Bouquets to ridding her friend of Satan's possession via a spontaneous exorcism (Sylvia was wearing entirely too much mascara that day and was obviously possessed), the adventures of little Bridget continues through Catholic catechism to Bishop O'Brien's Child's Guide to Avoiding Temptation. As Bridget approaches puberty, she assesses her mother and aunts, evaluates their lives and makes some decisions as to how she will grow up and run her own life in the future.

Tender and ruthlessly honest, Kathleen McCormick's beautiful first novel draws us into the world of Italian Irish Catholicism as experienced by its unforgettably wise and desperately innocent girl narrator. There's magic in this world—and while we are charmed by its glow, we are also unsettled again and again by the darkness behind that glow. We follow Bridget with trepidation, captivated by her vulnerability and her fierceness, trusting there's much to learn from her journey.
