

The four-letter 'w' word

"You betcha, I'm for securing the border. Let's do it with technology, drones, sensors and other fancy stuff, maybe a fence or some sort of barrier like junk cars from the 'Cash for Clunkers' program or possibly old worn-out tires, but we sure don't need a w__." Yup. Democrats will put on their finery, pick you up in their car and take you to the ball but they sure won't dance with you. And they certainly won't whisper the 'w' (wall) word in your ear at the punch bowl. America's mainstream media, Leftist pundits and bloggers and every Democratic Trump-hater that could walk or crawl to their TV were enraptured by the 'great Trump retreat' this week as the President signed a bill re-opening the 1/4 of the government that was shut down for 35 days.

"Trump caved! Whoopee! No more money for a 'w.' Take that Donald. Let my people go...from Honduras, El Salvador, Guatemala right through Mexico to the land of opportunity! We welcome you to freedom's shores!" You probably won't hear exactly these words from the Democrat rank and file, but you did hear another 'w' word from newly-elected Democratic Congressman Hakeem Jeffries from New York's 8th district who recently called the President, "the Grand Wizard." This is the same Congressman who blithely calls for a bi-partisan pajama party where Rs and Ds can bury the hatchet and find 'common ground' on border security. If you believe that the Democrats are really serious in sitting down with the anti-Christ and his denizens of the dark side to find an actual solution to border porosity I'll be happy to organize a Chupacabra or Jackalope hunt for you and even stock the chuck wagon with your favorite comfort food. Translation: that's not even remotely possible.

With this latest capitulation by the President, the Democrats and especially Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi have burnished their credentials as proud card-carrying members of the I hate Trump, all Republicans and common sense opposition party. By poking the big stick of failure in Trump's eye, the Democrats are currently reveling in orgiastic back-patting from their open borders comrades in arms, but they had better not get too confident of their ability to outsmart or outmaneuver President Donald J. Trump over time. The man is used to turning adversity into opportunity, and given his history, he will do it again.

What, if anything, will change the Democrats' minds?

We have three weeks to find out if the Democrats are capable of shape-shifting from the party of chronic intransigence to the party of occasional compromise on border security. Will they advocate for some of the wall on the 234 miles of the southern border the President wants or will they continue to oppose anything that looks like a wall? My prediction is that they will remain dug in, because the taste of victory extends way beyond the palate; it goes to the limbic system of the brain where memory lives, and Democrats love good memories, especially when they are of the anti-Trump variety. In the coming weeks, you should look for the newly-announced Democrat Presidential candidates along with their new colleagues of the progressive Left to be polled about the border and the 'w' ad nauseam. Then watch the singularly-focused, never-Trump media carry their water in interviews throughout the 24/7 news cycle. Despite the fact that 2,000 immigrants try to crash our border every single day, the Left will try to convince you that America is heartless by turning them away or making asylum-seekers remain in Mexico while their applications are being processed. The Dems will never admit that we have a crisis on the border, not until hundreds of Central American migrants are dropped off in front of their own houses in Georgetown or in their own Congressional districts.

But wait, that will never happen because of the phalanx of round-the-clock security guards or high walls of stone that protect their personal borders. How do you spell hypocrisy? With a capital 'D.'
