Why is having insurance important?

According to U.S. fire statistics, 50% of residential fires result from cooking accidents, 12.5% from heating, and 6.3% from electrical malfunctions. When half of residential fires are directly caused by humans, it's imperative that you have some kind of insurance policy in place in case something happens in one of your rental properties. This protects not just your business and your owners, but your renters' and owners' pockets as well.

What if renters don't want renters' insurance?

What most renters don't realize (especially younger renters) is that a landlord's insurance policy likely covers the building structure only and not any personal possessions within the unit(s). And if the unit becomes uninhabitable due to extensive damage, the property manager is not responsible for providing renters with temporary accommodation. And that might come as a shock to a renter if they need a place to stay.

Renters insurance policies provide displaced tenants with funds to cover temporary living arrangements and associated expenses; and, typically, they cover all a renter's belongings—from clothes and jewelry to electronics and whatever other valuables you own—at a fairly inexpensive price.
