

Carol brings a variety of experiences to her work. She lived in Los Angeles in the late 60's-70's, where she was a photographer working at a Los Angeles radio station. Her photographs were published in several music magazines. In 2007 she moved to Springfield and took an art class at the Springfield Art Museum.

She was hooked! A few years later she took extension classes at MSU in drawing, painting, and composition. It was there that she discovered the challenges and possibilities of using various mediums and began experimenting with combining them in her work.

Most recently she has discovered that her ideas about composition are changing. Previously, when photographing celebrities in California, the subject was always at the center of the picture. "Rock stars like to be the center of attention!" she says. However, as she has moved into drawing and painting, she has learned that focal points can be more appealing when off-center. While her preference now is painting landscapes, which she finds beautiful and tranquil, she knows she could always be tempted by a whole new path of expression tomorrow. Painting offers seemingly no end to her evolution and inspiration. She says, "I look forward to what tomorrow holds!"
