Leaf mail from Stewart Island

Visitors to Stewart Island in the early 1900's found a novel way of sending a postcard to friends, and would address and attach a stamp for postage to a native leaf found on the island Brachyglottis Rotundifolia. To visit would have been a great adventure, and very remote at the turn of the last century. There have been several post offices on the island at various times, but two were more accessible to visitors. Half Moon Bay in the settlement of Oban, which has the islands only post office today, and Paterson's Inlet on the island of Ulva which was there until early 1923.

Gazette", dated 10 September 1912 stated, 'Loose tree leaves are not to be accepted for transmission by post to any address.' So the opportunity of sending this unique souvenir posted from Stewart Island ceased.

If you are ever visiting Stewart Island there is still a way you can have a unique souvenir, pick yourself a Rotundifolia leaf, and address it to yourself with a message if you like. The post office will then hand-cancel it for you, place it inside a stamped addressed envelope and you have one special memento. Over time your leave will dry out so it's best to keep it inside the envelope and flat.

Stamps were not really made to be affixed to leaves; the uneven surface of the leaf often caused the stamp to come off in the postal system. The two postmistresses were very diligent in making sure the stamp stayed on the leaf by sewing it on as the above leaf shows, which was posted from Half Moon Bay on 9 January 1904.

Some messages written on the leaves are not quite correct, it may have seemed to this visitor that they were way down south in the world, but Paterson's Inlet post office was certainly the southern most in New Zealand!

The leaf below was sent in 2001 from Half Moon Bay Post Office by a keen philatelist!

HINGING

Stamp hinges were devised a long time ago so that stamps could be affixed to the album page, yet could also be peeled off later with no damage. There is only one major mistake one can make with stamp hinges, and that is putting too much moisture on a hinge so that it touches the stamp and therefore glues itself to the page.

Many stamps are damaged by careless hinging and to avoid this happening to your new collection, we offer the following practical hints,

1. Always use hinges of good quality.
2. Hinges should always be smaller than the stamp.
3. Lick hinges or better still, damp then as lightly as possible, taking special care of mint stamps.

For a very small stamp, cut a hinge in half, lengthways or widthways, depending on the shape.

Mount a pair of stamps like this, keeping the hinges clear of the perforations between the two.

If you have a block of stamps, don't tear them apart. Mount them together, using as many hinges as are necessary to fix the block securely.

4. Attach only the smaller part of the folded hinge to the back of the stamp.
5. Moisten only the lower part of the remaining section of the hinge for attachment to the album page. (This habit makes it possible to examine the stamps without damaging the perforations.)
6. If a stamp is wrongly affixed to the stamp page, let it dry thoroughly, sometimes this will be overnight, before attempting to remove it. If you try to remove too quickly the album page will be certainly marked.
7. Do not change hinges more often than you must. A good hinge not too heavily moistened, will survive numerous moves.

Mount a triangle like this, with the hinge on the side nearest the centre of the album so the stamp will not get crumpled when the album is shut.

If you mount a stamp in the wrong place, or get it crooked, wait for at least half an hour until the gum on the hinge has completely dried. Then the hinge will peel off the page and off the stamp without doing any damage. This means you can also take stamps out of your album to rearrange, sell or swap.

Oops!

In 1938 Fiji released for sale the stamp above left, and it has a well known design error. The boat has no helmsman. The stamp was not taken off sale, and is therefore one which you could find quite easily. When a second printing was necessary the error was corrected and issued in 1940 with a helmsman in the boat as shown on the second stamp.

Anyone who is collecting ships on stamps, these two would make a great addition to your collection. Mount them side by side, and show your philatelic knowledge.
