BIOGRAPHY

Since the day he plucked the fishing string his pop had rigged up on a broken acoustic guitar at 7 years old, Sam Terito has been enamored with music of all sorts. Though there were only three strings on this contraption (with half of the headstock broken off) he did his best to play along with the Hall and Oates cassette he'd swiped from the family hifi. For his 13th birthday, he was blessed to receive a pawn shop bass guitar that would form the cornerstone of his buddies' metal band...only to be forced to quit when grounded all summer after getting busted throwing bottles at cars.

Luckily, that was about as rebellious as his inner rockstar would get, and before long he was back making his mark in metal, funk, alternative rock, and eventually even country. Years later he was able to create a business out of local music, owning and operating a successful live music venue with some friends for several years. This eye opening experience highlighted the difference between acts that did and didn't make money, with a penchant for promoting bands that were able to push the biggest drink sales.

Today he is blessed to still be playing music with his best friends, some of which were in the first bands he formed nearly 25 years ago. With a focus on cover songs (rock, country, 70's/80's/90's hits) as well as writing his own music, he performs regularly from Texas to Florida and always does his best to warm up a drinking crowd.
