DURACELL, VIRUS, & MY KNEE

Last December, my right knee was getting enough worse that I was planning knee replacement surgery after the Cortizone shot did no good. Figuring that I would be home soon, I elected to wait for one of Virginia Masons' top carvers to take a crack at it. All hell then broke loose for all of us in the form of a virus that sounded very much like a tasty Mexican beer. All of us non-essential people were required to imprison ourselves in the closest residence available.

My home for the next six months was to be our motorhome parked in a desert in the middle of Arizona. Our RV is gorgeous – all 250 sq ft of it! I'm amazed to see what you can accomplish when you have unlimited time and next to nothing to do for the first time in your life. For example, I'll bet most of you have not checked all your batteries for voltage and arranged the good ones as to date, not to mention soaking the flashlight connections with baking soda and water. Duracell batteries engraved good through 2013 still work perfectly and you know where to get them cheap! The no-name imported ones will not last a year in the off position in my flashlights.

Now the knee: At the beginning of my six month sentence in the dessert, I was hobbling around with my knee brace and cane. Those electric carts in the market are a blast. I wore shorts to expose my $700 brace (thank you, Medicare); at 74 years-old, I did not want anyone to think I was using the cart because of my old age. Us old guys still have a little hope left, I guess.

Now see — I just used up an hour concocting this dribble.

If you dropped something when you were younger, you just picked it up. When you're older and drop something, you stare at it for a bit contemplating if you actually need it anymore.
