50 million accounts hit by security flaw!

According to Facebook, the accounts of 50 million users were affected by a security breach.

According to the company, hackers discovered a security flaw in the code that allows you to view your Facebook page as others see it. Crooks were able to steal access tokens (which are a bit like digital keys to your account) and then use them to take over other people's accounts.

Facebook says they took immediate steps to reset those access tokens. That means you may find yourself logged out of Facebook on some devices. The company says they aren't sure yet if your account was accessed or any of your data stolen. They also say there's no need to change your passwords. But to be safe, it's certainly not a bad idea. As always, keep an eye on all of your accounts for any suspicious activity.
