The National Recovery Administration, or NRA, was a major President Franklin D. Roosevelt “New Deal” agency that lasted 1933-35, designed to speed recovery from the Great Depression. It was created and designed to restore the economic health of American business. The NRA had four objectives: to spread work evenly among people; to distribute wages, thereby increasing purchasing power; To stop unfair trade practices and limit cutthroat competition; and to eliminate child labor. The organization’s poster symbol was a blue eagle.
